doing this day and night, you will find, oh wonder!: a limitless happiness. This is for immediately the mind find the place of the heart, the mind sees what it hasn't believe before: it sees the air from within heart and it seen itself wholly full of light and of discernment and, starting from that moment, immediately that a thought occurs, the mind banishes away and it destroys it, before becoming concretized and before taking shape, by calling the name of Jesus Christ."

3. A method very similar to the method from above, it is that of Nicephorus the monk. He, after quoting a series of places from the old spiritual fathers, which commend the cleaning of passions, he shows, in order to fully clarify his recipients, "what the attention is, and what one can achieve it like?".

"You know, he says, and that we breath the air not for something else but because of our heart. This is because the heart is the producer of the life and of the warmth within our body. Therefore, the heart attracts the breathing in order to exhale its own warmth out, and so to provide to itself an appropriate temperature. The cause of this oikonomia, or better said: its tool, it is the lung, which, by having from God a thin fabric, as some sheets, it introduces and it eliminates easily its content. Thus, the heart, by attracting the fresh air through breathing, and by eliminating the warm air, it preserved unbroken the order which it has been place for, in order to maintain the living organism. You, therefore, by sitting and by gathering your mind, you introduce your mind, on the way of your nostrils, where the air goes through, to your heart, and you push your mind and you force your mind to go along the air inhaled to the heart. By entering there, the lack of joy and of happiness will come to an end. As a man tuning back home, from where he left for a while, he is exceedingly happy for he has been found worthy of seeing again his children and his wife, likewise the mind, when united with the soul, it is filled up with pleasure and with untold happiness. Therefore, brother, teach your mind not to easily come out from there. This is because, at the beginning, the mind always wants to get out from the prison and from the narrowing of the inward things.

You must also know that while your mind is there, you must not stay in quietude and in laziness, but you must have as meditation object, ceaselessly, the words: Lord Jesus Christ, You Son of God, have mercy on me.

And when you become very tired and you no longer can enter the heart's parts, do what I am saying and with the help of God you will find what you are looking for: You know that the thinking power of each man it is in his chest, for within our chest, even while being silent with our lips, we are still speaking, deciding, praying, uttering psalms, and many other things. To this thinking power, by removing any thought from it (for, if you wish, you will be able to), give it the words: "Lord Jesus Christ, You Son of God, have mercy on me. And force your mind to shout out these words, inwardly, instead of any other idea. By doing this for a while, the entrance of your heart will open to you, as I have written you, without any doubt. We know this by experience. And it will come to you, together with the desired and pleasant attention, all the other virtues: the love, the joy, the peace, and the others". This whole writing, together with the quotes too, it is called as: "Word about Vigil and about the Guarding of the Heart". As one can see, we have in this "Word", concentrated, two methods. One method recommends us searching for the place of the heart, since the beginning, and to drive our mind towards our heart along with our inhaling; the other method recommends us, as introduction, the simple uttering, but a persistent uttering, of the Prayer of Jesus²²⁴. The second one doesn't differ from that one belonging to Pseudo John Chrysostom, the first one differs from that of Simeon by the fact that it shows that the air actually goes all the way to the heart, so that the mind too, going along with the air, it reached to the heart too, in other words, it is some kind of argument for the urge to drive the mind in the same place where the inhaling goes. On the other hand, it isn't so complete like that one belonging to Simeon is. It doesn't say anything about the body's position and about the place which the eyes must look at.

One can see that Nicephorus had and used the Simeon's method, and when Nicephorus started to explain that method in its essential part, he forgot about presenting the other parts too. Or, maybe by reckoning that the monks already knew those, he didn't repeat known things. Anyway, the method of Nicephorus could be sufficient to the ones wanting to practice the mind's prayer.

4. Gregory of Sinai directly quoted in his recommendations from Simeon's method. "By sitting, he said, from morning to evening on a narrow²²⁵ chair, gather your cogitation from mind into your heart and keep it there. Bend, strongly, your chest, your shoulders, and your neck, so that to feel a great pain, and perseveringly shout out with your mind or with your soul: "Lord Jesus Christ have mercy on me". Then, by moving your thought to the other half, say: You Son of God, have mercy on me. And by saying this half for many times, do not change the halves too often. This is because the plants which are continuously moved, they do not make roots. Retain the movement of your breathing too, in order not to breathe easily. This is because the air exiting from heart it darkens the mind and it kidnaps the thought, getting the mind far from there and giving it prisoner to the forgetfulness or making the mind to pass from a thought to another, and reaching, without realizing it, in the inappropriate things. And when you see the uncleanness of the evils ghost, or thought occurring and taking shape in your mind, do not let yourself to be bewildered even if they appear to you as being good thought, do not pay attention to them, but by holding your respiration as much as you can, and by locking your mind into your heart, and by continuously invoking on Jesus Christ, you burn them quickly and suppress them, by whipping them invisibly with the godlike name. This is for Climacus says: "Whip your enemies with the name of Jesus, for there is no other more powerful weapon in heavens or on earth".

²²⁴ One must avoid confounding "Jesus's Prayer" = "The Heart's Prayer", to the "Lord's Prayer". The Lord's Prayer is usually called, in the Romanian Orthodoxy as: "Our Father". There we have also the "Hierarchal Prayer" or the prayer uttered by our Lord Jesus Christ, as High Priest (Hierarch) to the Heavenly Father. (E. I. t.'s n.)

²²⁵ It is about 15 centimeters in width (E. I. t.'s n.)

Regarding the uttering of the name of Jesus, "some people, says Gregory Sinaites, they recommend that the prayer to be uttered by mouth, others say by mind. I recommend both of these. This is because sometimes the mind cannot utter it, because of being overwhelmed by worries, and sometimes the mouth cannot utter it. Only that you must invoke appeased and unagitated, lest your voice, by disturbing your mind's attention, to impede you praying. This is until the mind, by getting accustomed to this work, it will advance and it will receive power from the Ghost in order to be able to pray wholly, and perseveringly. Then you not longer need to speak with your mouth, but you won't even be able too; it will suffice to do the work with your mind".

Yet, Gregory Sinaites, likewise the others, he doesn't attribute a too great power to this way of keeping the mind within heart. "I hope you understand, he says, that nobody could keep his mind by himself, if the Ghost doesn't keep it... This is because by transgressing the commandments of the One Who has reborn us, we have separated us from God, and we have lost the capacity of feeling Him with our mind and of uniting us with Him. By sliding our mind from there and by getting separated from God, our mind is carries everywhere, as a prisoner. And we cannot stop our mind otherwise, but only if our mind obeys God and then it will be stopped by God, and it will be joyfully united with Him, and it will continuously and perseveringly pray to Him... Holding your respiration by pursing your lips, it restrains your mind, but only partially and then your mind gets scattered again. But when the prayer's work comes, then that one keeps to mind to itself and it fills the mind up with joy and it escapes the mind from slavery".

As we can see, Gregory of Sinai almost doesn't do else but explaining some places from the method of Simeon the New Theologian, and he insists upon some of them. He explains why the respiration must be hold as long as possible (in order not to be the mind taken by the air's movement coming from the heart, and so to get scattered) and he shows in more details, how one must bend down his body, by bowing towards the chest, and what one must utter the Jesus's prayer like, alternatively in halves, in order the prayer to be as unitary as possible, and the idea which the mind focuses on, to be as condensed as possible.

We actually have only a method, wholly expressed, but unexplained by Simeon the New Theologian, and explained in certain of its parts by Nicephorus the Monk, and in other parts explained by Gregory of Sinai. A sole develop method, for there existed an even simpler method, consisting only of perseveringly uttering the name of Jesus.

A problem raised concerning these methods it is that of their authors and of the time they were composed at." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 33-39)

Prayer

“The state of prayer it is a state of noticing, through an accentuated sensitiveness, God as a present You. Just because of this reason in prayer we speak directly to God (...). In this state of direct relationship with God, His power is felt directly too. Especially when the one asking for His help is conscious that that help cannot come but from God. If there are degrees of somebody’s presence in our life, the most accentuated degree of presence somebody has it when he stays before us as a second person and when we are in dialogue with that person. And this presence gains an even higher degree when we feel that person open to our appeal. That’s why God Whom we address in prayer, with the conviction that he listens to us and that He is assertive in helping us, He is felt in the degree of the most accentuated presence before us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 147)

“The believers experience the same power they are given towards a life of cleanness. As their efforts towards such a life are greater, the greater is the experiencing of the power of the Ghost of Christ. But even the ones who do not make too serious efforts towards cleanness, they still can experience the power of Christ in the holiness of other members of the Church. They experience Christ’s power in the fulfillment too of their prayers, and in the prayers of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

“The Church conveys Christ to us, out of itself, and the Church also occasions the dwelling of Christ from heavens, or from the ultimate height, in us. This is for Christ from within Church is the Same with Christ from the ultimate height, for the Church ranges to that ultimate height or depth. The Apostles receive the Holy Ghost, or they received Christ through the Holy Ghost, through the prayer they learnt from Christ (Acts 1: 14). Christ comes within us through our prayer. In our prayer we are assisted by the priest’s prayer and by the Church’s prayer, but we are assisted by the Holy Ghost too, and in this prayer is knowledge about Christ and a faith in Christ which come from Apostles. From Apostles it comes within Church, in the same time with the faith in Christ and with the knowledge about Him, the warmth of the prayer too and therefore Christ Himself and the Holy Ghost who are praying within us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 124)

“Anyway, the prayers and the songs for the forgiveness of the deceased one, they suppose a repentance of that one at least in the last moments of his life, a going out of the soul from the body in state of repentance, which we believe the soul will continue after death too. That’s why, these prayers and songs done by the ones attending the burial service, some of them are done on behalf of the deceased one, or, in the same song, the subject by turn the deceased one and the present congregation. Especially the prayer from the soul’s getting out from body, these prayers are done on behalf of the deceased one, expressing his repentance, from the moments immediately anterior to the soul’s exiting.” (Stăniloae 1997: 194)

“The Church’s conscience reckons that there is such a continuous gradation from the highest positions of the righteous to the lowest positions, and from here to the sinners, so that some of the ones declared at the individual judgment as righteous, but in a more reduced degree, and the ones being in paradise, they do not radically differ from the ones having in them the stains of the sins in smaller degrees and they have been left in hell, though the Church reckons as important the separation between paradise and hell. This makes possible that the ones who are in hell, but not too radically differing from the ones being on the lowest positions in paradise, to cross to paradise until the final judgment, through the prayers of the saints and of the people on earth.” (Stăniloae 1997: 218)

“There still is a lowest part of the hell, where are the ones who were totally sinner, as there are the paradise’s heights, where the saints are. The ones from paradise, even from the inferior places, they will remain in paradise also after the final judgment, but until then they can progress to increasingly higher positions, through the prayer of the one on earth and through their prayers for the ones on earth and for they to enter increasingly more actively the communion with Christ; and the ones from the highest position they will progress too, in glory, through their prayers for the ones on earth and by entering increasingly deeper the communion with Christ, and of increasingly more souls, in the happy communion with Christ and with them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 218)

“When a person prays for another person, he is exercising a responsibility for that person and, consequently, from him it reaches the respective person a flux of love opening that person to communion. And if the prayer is intense and persevering, it will be impossible the callousness of that person not to be mellowed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 219)

“The relations accomplished through prayer are the most loving relations; and, paradoxically, these relations are the easiest to be accomplished, for the Holy Ghost bringing His help in committing the prayer. Through prayer you want that your fellow human to live forever, into happiness, you wish for him the absolute, and you want to be with him in a eternal communion; through prayer you do not reserve for yourself any possibility of interrupting someday the communion with him, or in order to impede him tomorrow to be happy.” (Stăniloae 1997: 219)

“When two persons pray for one another, both of them are in the exercise of the responsibility for one another. When only one of the persons prays for the other one, the last one isn’t in this exercise of the responsibility and doesn’t notice in a conscious manner the exercise of responsibility of the other person for him. But, in the end, the last person still has a benefit out of the first person’s prayer for him. Anyway, there is not prayer without responsibility, and in responsibility, a person experiences the bond he was with another person in, a bond not depending either on his own will, nor on the will of the other person, but depending on the dialogical structure imprinted within each person, and within Church, depending also on the Ghost of Christ Who strengthens this dialogical bond amongst persons.” (Stăniloae 1997: 219-220)

“One can say that the deed which somebody helps and upholds others through, it is the occasion or the means which God upholds and helps him through; it is the effort that, by mobilizing somebody’s energies, it opens him to the divine energy, communicated towards the benefit of the one who makes the effort and towards the one in favor of whom that effort is made. The one who wants to make the effort exclusively in his own benefit, he is the victim of a spiritual short-circuit; the one who doesn’t want to lighten the others, he doesn’t lighten himself too. By not wanting to become environment of generous propagation of God’s love, by not being himself warmed up by the generous flux of the divine love, not only that he doesn’t convey God’s love further, but it doesn’t allow God’s love to fully produce its effect within him too. And his disposition of receiving and conveying generously the divine help, it is shown in his prayer for others.” (Stăniloae 1997: 220-221)

“Any believer doesn’t only appeal to the prayer of another but himself prays for that person. He commits himself to pray, when he appeals to another’s pray; or, the one whom the appeal to prayer is made to, he addresses at his turn, an appeal to the first one, to pray to God for him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 221)

“Both, the ones who appeals to somebody to pray for him and the appealed one, they are responsible to God. Both of them, they are tied to God and to one another through the answer each one of them must give to God for another. The connection between believers it is a connection into God and vice versa: the connection of a believer with God it is a connection with the others. The one who doesn’t feel himself tied to another; he loses the connection with God too. The one who prays to God for another he has that one not only in his thoughts, but he is in a dialogical connection with that one and that’s why he answers him by fulfilling his appeal to pray to God for him. This real connection of his with God, which the fellow human he prays for is included in, it explains the divine power flowing both in the one who prays, giving him the power for praying, and in the one whom the first one prays for, by fulfilling what is asked through the prayer for.” (Stăniloae 1997: 221-222)

“The believers continue to feel themselves responsible for their fellow human who passed away. They live also with those ones in a dialogical bond. They cannot erase those ones from their heart and from their diptych, but they no longer mention them amongst the living ones, but they list them amongst the deceased ones. And in this responsibility of theirs, for those ones, it is reflected the will of God Who wants to keep us further tied to them and through this connection Him to pour His love upon the ones who died in faith, through the love of the living ones for them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 222)

“God wants everybody to be saved (1 Tim. 2: 4-6). (...) But on this purpose, God wants to associate everybody in His generous impulse towards everybody, in order everybody to simultaneously enjoy the divine generosity and the generosity of as many people as possible. That’s why God doesn’t forget either the deceased ones, and He makes the living ones not to forget those too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 222)

“The ones who died in faith they accepted to enter the living and life giver dialogue with God, before their death, even if they didn’t fully engage in this dialogue, and even they didn’t answer with the whole their being the appeal from God. Consequently, they died in the dialogical connection, actualized in some degree, with God. And God no longer let them outside the connection with Him, after they no longer can do anything in order to progress in this connection. They remain in the memory of God. But the one who remains in God’s memory he remains in His preoccupation too, meaning a connection with God. And that one’s soul doesn’t totally die. This is for the preoccupation of God with him it means that God thinks at him, a fact that is equal to directing the word and the life giver flux from God towards him. And the word of God keeps alive the one whom it is addressed to, through the appeal to God in his conscience, through the need to answer, which is lived by that one in his being. But God never addresses Himself to a man in isolation, for He doesn’t see the man as isolated. God sees every man in his dialogic and existential connections with his fellow humans, and God directs His preoccupation towards him, in order His word to be spread through that man to others too, for awakening those ones too, to an answer, either those ones need to be helped through the one who God speaks to, or that the one God is directly preoccupied with he needs the help from others. Thus, if the believer in his prayer for other he accomplished a dialogue directed both towards God and towards man, this is due to the fact that God Himself incites him to this dialogue, by reminding him about another and by asking him for the prayer for another, of he shows Himself to be preoccupied with that one too, and, even more, He has already started to work for spiritually help that one, by including in His dialogue with the one whom he asks the prayer from, also the one for whom he asked for the prayer, or in His preoccupation directed towards the one who need prayer, he includes also the one whom He asks for the prayer to.” (Stăniloae 1997: 222)

“If we pray, at our turn, for God to remember the deceased ones, this won’t mean that we have the initiative in remembering those ones, but it means that God considers as necessary both our answer and the answer of the deceased ones, invigorated by our answer to His preoccupation with them, in order this preoccupation of His to become as efficient as possible and to make them truly alive. Only thus, the remembrance of God which we ask for, for those ones, it keeps those ones alive for eternity, for only thus the true dialogue between Him and them is maintained, and they, by answering together with us and consequently to our answer, the preoccupation of God with them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 223)

“Anyway, the remembrance by God it has the power of maintaining alive for eternity, the ones who answer this remembrance. We do not have such a power, because of, the moment of the parting with us of the deceased one it slips further in the past, their memory weakens within us, and together with this it weakens also our power to maintain them in connection with us, and therefore alive. Only for and through God they remain present and living, for to God there is no past. Then, the Church remembers those ones, by and large, when committing the Eucharistic sacrifice, and God eternally maintains the deceased ones in His memory, since their kindred - who knew them - have prayed for them, and since the Church prays for them generally; and within Church there are the saints too, who keep their memory forever.” (Stăniloae 1997: 223)

“When we ask God for the “eternal remembrance” of somebody, we ask for that person to be remembered by God in the present too, as he will be remembered in eternity, and so to be kept alive ceaselessly. If we have asked God to remember that person only since the final judgment further, it would have meant that God keeps that person forgotten for a while, and after that God will again remember that person. We do not ask God for remembering that person only for sometimes, but we ask God to have that person ceaselessly in His mind, forever and ever. Through prayers, we keep the ones who once lived, eternally alive. Nobody is definitively lost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 224)

“Saint Gregory Palamas know as a level superior to the negative theology a fuller and more existential apophatism, accomplished through the clean prayer. This is an ecstasy of the interior silence, a total stopping from thinking in front of the divine mystery, before descending the godlike light from above in the mind stopped thus by amazement.” (Stăniloae 1992: 211)

“The prayer itself has several levels, each level corresponding to one of the levels of the spiritual ascension which the man is on. This is for the prayer must always accompany the man in his ascension.” (Stăniloae 1992: 212)

“Letting aside the prayer asking for material good and which is an inferior prayer, we could judge the progress in the worthy to be praised prayer, according to the following criteria: according to the prayer’s object, according to the prayer’s more or less consummate focusing, and according to the soul’s state of quietude after praying. Regarding the first ones, Evagrius recommend that before praying: “to clean yourself of passions and secondly to deliver yourself of nescience and forgetfulness; in the third place, clean yourself of all temptation and desertion” (Heads about Prayer in The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 80). In the generality of these three kinds of prayers differing according to their content, they would correspond to the three levels of the spiritual ascension: the purification, the illumination, and the union. In what concerns the last criterion, on any level, the true prayer tends to keep the mind not-stolen by any thought or by any worry; on the measure it succeeds in banishing the thoughts more fully and for a longer period of time, it is a more consummate prayer. The truly consummate prayer is the clean prayer, namely that prayer done by the mind when the mind has reached the capacity of easily banishing away and for a long time any thought when praying. But the man reaches this capacity only after he has cleaned himself of passions. Not even the innocent thought will disturb the mind when praying, if the prayer is consummate. That’s why, the clean prayer is being done only after the mind has been elevated above the contemplation of the seen nature and above concepts, when the mind no longer deals with any image or any concept. That’s why we reckon that one can know the clean prayer also for the fact that this prayer no longer has any object but, after crossing over all object in order of their increasingly higher values, the mind only asks now for the mercy of God, for the mind feels Him as Master Whose mercy the mind depends on.” (Stăniloae 1992: 212)

“We can add two more criteria measuring the prayer’s progress: the diminution of the words and the multiplication of the tears.” (Stăniloae 1992: 213)

“In its peak, the prayer is a clean prayer by the fact that it no longer has any object and it no longer uses any word, but the mind gathered back from anything it is aware of being in front of God; that’s why this prayer is also called as the prayer of the mind.” (Stăniloae 1992: 213)

“Of course, not even on the highest peaks of the spiritual life, the mind cannot be always empty of content, even of simple, dispassionate ideas about things. It, though, the one who strives for consummation he is required to make his prayer increasingly uninterrupted, this is actually an increasingly remembrance of the name of God or of the name of Jesus, not with the exclusion of the innocent ideas but parallel to them, as means of maintain in cleanness the one who prays. So, the “ceaseless prayer” is something else than the “clean or mental prayer” during which the mind has no idea, no thought, except the shapeless thought to God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 213)

“Of course, between the “ceaseless prayer” and the “clean or mental prayer” there is a tight connection. The same few words are used by both of these prayers. Then, someone won’t be able to reach the consummate prayer at once, this being the consummate prayer, if he hasn’t habituated himself to keep God always in his thought, and if the thinking at God it hasn’t become sweetness to him. That’s why the clean prayer isn’t except the flame raising up increasingly often from the fire of the ceaseless prayer.” (Stăniloae 1992: 213)

“By and large, the Eastern spirituality recommend the following conditions in order the mind to reach the state of the clean prayer:

1) The mind must turn back from the outside things to its inside, towards its “heart” by leaving any object.

Through mind they understand, of course, the mind’s work overflowing towards the sensitive world, as Saint Gregory Palamas explains. And the heart, which the mind must get back towards, it is just the mind’s center which the mind by being at, it no longer looks outside, towards things, but it looks towards God. The mind, by turning back within heart, it turns back “home”, as it is said in the Method of Nicephorus from Loneliness. Diadochus calls this center sometimes as “the mind’s rooms” and sometimes as “the heart’s deep”. And when he understands through “mind” the mind’s work, then its center he calls it as heart, and when he understands through mind the mind’s being, then he calls as center the “heart’s deep” or “the heart’s rooms” etc.”

2. The mind’s preoccupation must be maintained only with a few words addressed to Jesus, namely by perseveringly remembering Him, and this remembrance is a means that helps the mind to gather up from scattering and it guides the mind towards the unique target which the mind must reach at, since even the cleanest prayer still must maintain the thought of the presence of Jesus.

At Diadochus these words are only two in number, namely the strict essential in order to keep our thought to Jesus as our Master: “Lord Jesus”. Later, some other words have been added to these two words. Through them it isn’t expressed a partial request, because if that was the case, it would give the mind an object, a defined form, and therefore it is expressed only the general request for the mercy from Christ, or for feeling the need for His mercy. Behold the usual content of this prayer: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me the sinner.” These words comprise in the same time with the awareness about the presence of Jesus, the awareness of the own sinfulness and of the need for mercy from Jesus. These words express a report of the man’s dependency not on an impersonal force but on the loving mercy from the supreme Person. This feeling doesn't need concepts in order to be lived, but it creates and it upholds a unitary, simple, and existential state of humbleness, in front of the Merciful Jesus." (Stăniloae 1992: 213-214)

"If the mind can renounce to images and concepts, it still won't be able to by and large renounce to some work or feeling, except for short moments of silence or of internal kidnapping, obtained at the end of the prayer. That's why, if one stops the mind from going out and it forces the mind to turn back towards its center, namely towards "heart", he must give the mind another content; namely that content which we want our mind to gather into." (Stăniloae 1992: 214)

"By turning the mind back, namely by tuning the mind's work into heart, or into the heart's deep, and by having as ceaseless preoccupation the short prayer addressed to Jesus, one can obtain several things:

a) The mind (the mind's work) by no longer spending time for looking at the external things, it will no longer be in danger to be stolen by passionate thoughts. Thus, the mind overcomes its own fickleness and scattering, by becoming unitary and focused, or simplified.

b) Through this focusing and through the name Jesus the mind defends its own inside against sinful thoughts. Sometimes they say that the heart must be guarded against the passionate thoughts attempting to enter the heart, or that the heart must be cleaned of the thoughts which dominate the mind. But Diadochus of Photice explained that this heart that can be penetrated by passionate thoughts it isn't actually the heart itself, but here is about the regions from around the heart, namely, by and large here, is about the soul's inside. Here try to penetrate the "ghosts from beneath", as says Saint Gregory Palamas, out of the passionate conscious. Guarding the mind, in this sense, it means not to let unwatched any part of the soul or any movement of the body. In another sense, guarding the heart means actually guarding the mind, in order the mind not to leave the heart.

c) Even if these thoughts cannot enter the heart, but crowding around the heart they no longer let the heart to open. By gathering as a cloud around the heart, the heart loses its habituation of openly looking towards the sky. This has become to the heart a simple virtuality no longer making its presence felt.

At the beginning, the mind that wants to turn back towards the heart, that mind find the heart's place with difficulty. That mind must fight the thoughts from around the heart for a long time, in order to cut road towards the heart and in order to open the heart. Namely, the mind regains with difficulty its habituation of looking through heart at God, of preoccupying itself with Him, of reopening its eye that has as function to see the spiritual things. When the mind's work that was accustomed to occupy itself with the exterior things, not it has regained its habit of occupying itself with God, namely when the mind has fully turned back inside, within heart, and it has opened the heart, then the mind meets there God face to face, without seeing Him through some image or to cogitate Him through some concept, but by directly living His presence, or by feeling itself as being in His presence. By penetrating the heart, the mind comes across to Jesus Christ, Who has been there since Baptism. In other words, the conscious work of the mind penetrates our supra- or trans-conscious, which the grace of Christ is within, and it sets in work the great treasures from there and the capacity of noticing the godlike realities. This is for the mind is set in a living communication with Christ Himself, Who is the source of all powers and meanings from above nature.

The mental or clean prayer doesn't mediate a knowing of God through creatures, but through the deeps of the own soul, through the "heart". This means actually directly feeling Him, for the man forgets even about his heart when, gathered in his heart, he feels the presence of Jesus Christ, in the atmosphere of the Kingdom of Heavens being inside him. Saint Isaac the Syrian says that then it ceases from within mind even the prayer's movement, for the mind is kidnapped by the godhead and by the greatness of the Master Whose wonderful presence is being felt. He said: "So the prayer is interrupted in the time of the prayer, from its movement, and the mind is caught and sunk in the amazement of the kidnapping and it forgives the desire from its demand" (Word XXXII).

d) This state is also called as openness of the heart also for the fact that the heart is crossed through by the love for Jesus. And until the mind doesn't start feeling a pleasure in perseveringly remembering the name of Jesus, in the same time looking at the things from inside, this is a sign that the "heart" hasn't been found yet, or that the heart hasn't been opened yet. But it is enough the mind to do this effort of turning back in itself and of perseveringly remembering the name of Jesus. This is for the mind by doing so, the Lord Himself removes the heart's wall and he shows Himself, attracting the mind to Himself and planting into mind the love for Him. Or: "The grace itself cogitates together with the soul and shouts together with the soul: Lord Jesus Christ. This is for we necessarily need His help for, by uniting and by sweetening all our thought with His sweetness, to be us able to move with the whole our heart towards remembering God and our Father" (The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 353)." (Stăniloae 1992: 215-217)

"The methods formed in East in order to facilitate, through some procedures, the elevation of the mind to the clean prayer, better said the variants of the same method for the differences between them consist of the fact that each variant insists upon different details than other methods do, are the followings:

1) The method bearing the name of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. It is called The Method of the Holy Prayer and Attention and the old-Greek text has been published for the first time by Hausherr in the year 1927. It is the oldest one we know, amongst the written versions, being in a codex from the end of the XI Century or from the beginning of the XII Century (Vat. Gr. 658). This proof was brought by M. Jugie against J. Hausherr, who, by adhering to the opinion of some authors from before him that this method cannot belong to Simeon, he argued for the first time that the method belonged to Nicephorus the Monk, who lived in the second half of the XIII Century. But this opinion had to definitively be renounced to, consequently to a text which we have been lucky to find it amongst the inedited writings of Palamas which we have published in the book about The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas (Sibiu, 1938, pp. 54-55). Palamas, for he knew the method of Nicephorus the Monk, he didn't identify it to that one known under the name of Simeon the New Theologian, but he acknowledged this one too as author of a different method.

So, even if Saint Simeon the New Theologian wasn't the author of this method, this method still is older than the method of Nicephorus the Monk from the XIII Century, since Gregory Palamas received from his antecessors, amongst whom some of them knew Nicephorus the Monk, this tradition.

The method of Saint Simeon the New Theologian starts by showing that there are three kinds of prayers. The first two ones are deceiving, and only the third one is "giving birth to light". The first kind of prayer is accompanied by the work of the imagination. The one who prays raises his hands, his eyes, and his mind to heavens and starts imagining with his mind the godlike things, the heavenly goods, the angelic groups, the dwelling places of the saints, shortly: everything he has heard from the Holy Scripture he gathers them in his mind, in the time of the prayer, moving his soul towards the live for God by those imaginings, and even shedding some tears. Thus he starts getting haughty without realizing that, and he reckons that this is a grace from God. Sometimes this type of prayer is accompanied by pretended extraordinary phenomena, as luminous visions, sensations of fragrances, unreal voices. All of these are the traces of a getting astray that can lead the man to madness. The cause is that the man hasn't achieved firstly the dispassion and the virtues. He is amongst the beginners.

In the second type of prayer, the mind, after it has turned back from the sensitive things and from the sensations coming from outside, for a while it focuses upon the prayer's words, and then it examines the thoughts rushing into the soul trying to banish them away. This is a struggle that doesn't allow him to settle down and to work his virtues. The great danger stalking the one who indulge himself to this kind of prayer it is the vain glory, making him to despise the other people. This second type of prayer – as the Method says – it surpasses the first kind of prayer, as a night with full moon surpasses the night without stars and light, or like the youth surpasses the spiritual childhood. This is the phase of the psalmody, of the sweetening with gentle words. In the first phase one couldn't psalmody because of "one cannot sing to the Lord in foreign country, or in a passionate heart". This is the prayer of the spiritually advanced ones.

The third kind of prayer starts through obedience and it consists of the fact that during its time the mind guards the heart and from the heart's deep its demands raise towards the Lord. This type of prayer is the prayer of the spiritual man. But this type of prayer will be possible only if the soul has reached before the consummate dispassion, by rejecting all the affections for the world, and by obeying a spiritual guide he has become accustomed to no longer do his wills but he has modified any of his addiction to the world. The mind of this one it cannot be any longer attracted by devil by any cunning and towards any thoughts, but it remains free of all things, being able to easily banish away any thought coming in, in order to pray with a clean heart. This is a long-lasting beginning of the consummate prayer.

As one can see, even according to this Method, one reaches the clean prayer not at once – neither can anybody to do it -, by using some physiological methods, as argued in derision the Western theologians, but this is the coronation of some long efforts of purification of passions and thoughts. Only after somebody has achieved a clean conscience towards God, towards people, and towards the world's things, he can use these procedures as some auxiliary means in order to achieve the clean prayer. Therefore, these procedures aren't essential, but essential is the permanent state which somebody has achieved. Such a man, anyway, he can easily pray cleanly. So, the one who has reached the dispassion and the cleanness, when he wants from time to time to be elevated to the state of prayer free of any thoughts, he must gather his mind in the deep of his heart and from there he must elevate his prayer towards God. Then he can use in order to gather his mind within his heart also the following auxiliary procedures: "Sitting down in a quiet monastic cell, alone in a corner, do what I am saying to you: close the door and raise your mind from everything that is vain and perishable. Then, lean your chin on your chest and direct your sensitive eyes with the whole your heart towards yourself. And prolong a little also the inbreathing in order to keep your mind and to focus the place of your heart, where usually are all the soul's powers. Firstly, you will find a thick darkness, impassable. But by persevering and by doing this day and night, you will find a wonder, an untold happiness. This is for immediately the mind finds the heart's place, the mind will see what it has never thought to see before: it sees the air from the heart's darkness and it sees itself as whole, full of discernment power, and, since then, immediately that a thought appears it banishes that thought away and it destroys that thought before crystallizing and taking shape, by calling on Jesus Christ."²²⁶

But the Method knows even a fourth type of prayer, that one belonging to the spiritual man, when the mind no longer needs such natural auxiliary physiological methods, or such toils, in order to achieve its state of focusing into heart, but it achieves this state at once and it remains steadfastly in contemplation. Only this ends the ladder of the prayer. From here one can see that the recommendations of physiological order are useful only to the ones who haven't accustomed themselves yet to the clean prayer, but they are in the phase of starting to themselves accustom to it. These methods are addressed to the ones who haven't consolidated themselves yet steadfastly in dispassion.

²²⁶ So is the neo-Greek text from the Greek Philokalia. The detail with the "belly button" it is only in the old-Greek text published by Hausherr and it seems to be interpolated by some adversaries of the hesychasts. (note no. 422 of Father Professor Dumitru Stăniloae)

Going back to the third kind of prayer described by us in the fragment from above, we ascertain that the gathering of the mind within heart with the calling of Jesus Christ, the light seen by the mind reached there and the easily banishing of any thought are elements taken identically from Diadochus of Photice. What is characteristic to the Method are the following physiological elements:

a) Directing the look towards chest as parallel to this fact the mind to search for and to find the place of the heart.

b) Compressing the breathing.

For the last detail the Method doesn't give any explanation, while other methods offer all the explanations concerning the breathing. That's why it is hard to believe that this Method made such a recommendation without presupposing that there were some explanations for it.

These are the considerations for we tend to believe that though this Method is attributed to Simeon, though it actually is older than the other methods we know, it still isn't the first method. We can ascertain that there was circulating as tradition a practice with several variants, and there were explanations for all their aspects. The one who recorded this Method only presented one of its variants. He wrote it down and he did it rather for his personal use and for the use of some people close to him, and that might be the reason why he didn't specify all the necessary explanations for these ones were known out of oral tradition.

2) But on the time of the Hesychasm the method enjoying the greatest authority was that of Nicephorus the Monk. That's why even at that time they very seldom spoke about Simeon as author of some method. We think that Simeon's Method never enjoyed a considerable authority given the fact that it didn't bring any important specification regarding the breathing.

The Method of Nicephorus the Monk it is the second one written according to the oldness. Nicephorus was born around the year 1215 in Italy, and around the year 1260 he went to Athos where he learnt, from the most advanced fathers, the art of the appeasement, and then he became the guide of the younger ones. "To these ones he composed also a collection of Patristic explanations, which strengthens for fight and it shows the ways of wars and the rewards and the crowns of the victory. For he saw that these ones cannot fight the fickleness of the mind, he composed for them also a procedure which they could stop through, the mind's scattering and fantasy" (Word II Triad II of Palamas). One of these disciples was a teacher to Palamas. The hesychast movement from Athos it actually started through Nicephorus the Monk, and therefore this procedure was the one most widely practiced. But for Nicephorus at his turned he learnt from others the craftsmanship of the prayer, his procedure it actually presents an existing practice. His Method, which in the first part it is a collection of Patristic explanations, and in the second part it actually is a procedure, it was published for the first time in the Greek Philokalia, where it was called as: Word about Taking Vigil and Guarding the Mind, and from there it has been taken in Migne, G.P., 147, col. 960.

Behold the procedure that, according to Nicephorus “it quickly leads to dispassion and to seeing God”:

“You know that what we breathe is the air, and that we breathe the air not because of something else but because of our heart. This is for the heart is the producer of the life and of the warmth within body. Therefore, the heart attracts the breathing in order to eliminate its own warmth and to provide the right temperature to itself. The cause of this oikonomia, or better said its tool, it is the lung, which, by having from God a thin fabric, as some sheets, it easily introduces and eliminates the content. Thus, the heart, by attracting through breathing the fresh air and by eliminating the warm air, it preserves unbroken the order which it has been placed for, in order to uphold the organism. Therefore you, by seating and gathering your mind, introduce the mind on the way of your nostrils, where the air goes to the heart through, and force your mind to go together with the air you inhale, to the heart. By entering there, the absence of the joy and the absence of the happiness will come to an end. As a man who, when turning back home from his field work, he no longer knows what to do because of his joy that he has been found worthy to come back and to meet again his children and his wife, likewise the mind, when united with the soul, it is filled up with pleasure and with untold happiness. So, brother, teach your mind not to easily get out of there. This is because at the beginning the mind always wants to get out of that prison and form the grip of the inward things. You must know also that, while your mind is there, you don’t stay in silence and laziness, but you have as object of ceaseless cogitation the words: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me”. And if by toiling a lot, you still cannot enter the heart’s surroundings, as I told you, do what I am saying to you and with the help from God you will find what you are searching for. You know that the thinking power of each man it is in his chest, for within the chest, even while we do not move our lips, we still are speaking, deciding, making prayers, uttering psalms, and many other things. To this thinking power, while removing any thought from it – for it will be possible to you if you want it – give it the words: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me”. And force your mind to shout out these words within yourself, instead of any other thought. By doing this for some time, the entrance of your heart will open to you too, as I have written to you, without any doubt. We know this out of experience. And there will come to you in the same time with the desire and with the pleasant taking-heed, the whole group of the virtues: the love, the joy, the peace, and the other ones”.

As we can see in this “Word” we do not have only a method, but we have two methods: one that recommend from the beginning to be searched for the place of the heart and to be sent the mind there in the same time with the breathing, and a method that recommends, in order to achieve the same goal, the simple but persistent uttering of the prayer addressed to Jesus. The second method doesn’t differ from the method attributed to Saint John Chrysostom, and this is a proof for the fact that the physiological procedures weren’t reckoned as essentially necessary. And the first Method doesn’t say anything about the body’s posture and about where to look with our eyes, but it only explains the reason why the breathing must be organized, and this shows that this Method is either only an explanation of a recommendation left unexplained in the Method of Saint Simeon the New Theologian, or that it was supposed to be known as an existent practice. Better said, the observation that the thinking power is located in the chest and that it must utter where it is the prayer of Jesus, would justify us to accept that Nicephorus the Monk presupposes some turning of the look towards the chest.

Anyway, in the Method of Nicephorus the sole physiological element, somehow strangely, it is that of the breathing. Nicephorus explains in the first place the role of the breathing: that one of keeping a moderate temperature for the heart. In organism there is a burning process that produces certain warmth. This warmth is felt especially by the heart. The air we breathe it has the purpose of lowering this temperature. It is actually a common knowledge that we inhale taking in cold air and we exhale eliminating warm air. This can maintain a calm state and therefore it can prolong the prayer.

But the Method of Nicephorus it stops here with the explanations, by not drawing out of them the practical conclusions, namely it doesn’t show that our of the mentioned premises it turns out a necessity of having a regulated breathing for, by keeping within body a normal temperature and a natural mood, these ones to positively influence the soul’s life and to be possible to prolong the prayer for a long time. For instance, we know that an accelerated breathing, namely by not receiving enough cold air (air rich in oxygen) and by not sufficiently eliminating the warm air (loaded with carbon dioxide) it increases the warmth within body and this brings a state of disquietude. The man who breathes too quickly he cannot think peacefully. Also, when the man is grabbed by passion, he breathes quickly, gasping for air, because of not taking enough oxygen and not eliminating enough carbon dioxide. Dominating a passion can be obtained by appeasing the way we breathe in, this being a proof of the interdependency between body and soul. By and large, we know that the quietude and the self-control are intertwined with “cold blood”, with a moderate temperature, and with a calm breathing. The full stomach, for instance, it warms up the blood, while the hunger keeps the blood cold.

Nicephorus didn't use scientific terms as burning process, oxygen, or carbon dioxide, which the chemistry brought up later. But his observations constitute a precise recording of the process, in its empirical side, and therefore they present, in their own way, a scientific truth.

For Nicephorus didn't bring the explanations to an end, but he stopped before drawing a conclusion, we can say that his Method doesn't present all the reasons which stood at the basis of these procedures which surely were known to many, or, anyway, the initiators of this practice knew them. From here one can see also that Nicephorus' Method is based not only on that one of Simeon, but it was based on a practice existing at that time, as in case of the second Method too. From this point of view the Method of Simeon can be regarded as more complete for, though doesn't give any explanation, it recommends a holding of the breathing, whilst the Method of Nicephorus gives explanation, but it doesn't draw out of them the conclusion of the practical recommendation of holding the breathing. In the Method of Simeon is said though: "Compress your air breathing, in order not to breathe easily". (Stăniloae 1992: 217-223)

"In the world of the Eastern monasticism they tried to find some methods consisting of supporting the mind's effort of turning inwardly, by using some procedures which the body is employed in. These procedures are based, by and large, on the interdependence between soul and body, or on the unity of their movements. As the soul's states are extended in the external attitudes and in the bodily movements, likewise the external gestures and positions, if accompanied by concentrating the thought upon them, the considerably influence the soul's moods. A humble soul makes the body kneeling, but also a kneeling accompanied by focusing the thought on God it produces within soul a state of humbleness. The abstract spiritualism of a part of the Western Christendom, manifested on the field of the religious practice, it is unnatural. Such spiritualism it has forced its attitudes, and thus it has been accomplished only by forcedly stopping the wave of feeling born within soul and started towards body, or which by being born out of a bodily attitude extends itself upon the soul." (Stăniloae 1992: 217)

"At a first glance it would seem that there is a contradiction in the two Method of Nicephorus the Monk and of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. This is because on one hand they reckon that an accelerated breathing disturbs the inner state by the fact that it doesn't absorb and it doesn't eliminate enough air, and therefore they recommend the breathing to be done satisfactorily. On the other hand, they recommend the breathing to be compressed in order one to not breathe easily, a fact that would mean also insufficiently receiving and eliminating of air, leading to an accelerate breathing. But we ascertain that compressing our inhaling and exhaling it doesn't mean a diminution of the receive and eliminated air, but only extending these phases, namely doing them more rarely but also more profoundly. The air is taken in and is eliminated more gradually, and not at once, but just because of that one takes the air in and he eliminates it more fully. Only by this compression the process of breathing is fully accomplished and the body's temperature and mood are preserved, and therefore the mood of the soul is preserved too as normal and steadfast. Besides these, this unfolding of the breathing process keeps in a peaceful state the whole organism, and the mind can focus in an undisturbed manner on its meditation." (Stăniloae 1992: 224)

"Nicephorus the Monk, despite the fact that he started from explanations, he stops explaining before drawing the conclusions, and he passes to another idea related to the breathing, better said he shows himself preoccupied with drawing another conclusion regarding the rhythmical character of the breathing. So, after he has showed that the purpose of the breathing is to keep a "appropriate temperature" in organism, he continues: "You, therefore, by seating and by gathering your mind, introduce your mind on the way of your nostrils where the air goes to the heart on, and push your mind and force your mind to go, together with the inhaled air, to the heart". It isn't about the mind's being, as Palamas explained, but it is about the mind's work, namely it is about cogitation or attention. Through this recommendation the attention is stopped from directing towards the things from outside and it is turned inwardly. Of course, the attention isn't something physical in order to be possible to send the attention together with the air to the heart. But it isn't less true that the attention can follow a physical movement. Here is recommended that the attention to follow the movement of the air to the heart. But because we do not feel the air's movement after it passed through lungs, the road forwards, to the heart, it must be done by our attention accompanying our imagination. But they mustn't stop either at the physical heart, but they must cross beyond, to the spiritual heart, by exceeding everything. Actually, this is what it is intended: that the cogitation to turn upon itself renouncing to any defined object. And because the cogitation cannot notice itself, the cogitation is given as preoccupation, after it has withdrawn from everything, the thought at Jesus Christ. Following the line of the inhaling it is an auxiliary means for this withdrawal of the attention from things, for the turning of the cogitation upon itself.

The imagination plays a great role here. Feeling the course that the air goes towards heart on, attracting our attention upon itself, it makes us imagining how, in parallel to it, our cogitation too it goes inwardly; it actually goes. But it doesn't go on a material road and it doesn't stop at the material heart. This material road watched attentively it is an occasion that eases and simplifies the movement the cogitation makes when turned upon itself, like leaning the forehead against out hand it is an occasion that eases our focusing upon one thing. The inhaling must take a long time, for in parallel to it there goes also the cogitation towards interior, until there's nothing left except the cogitation itself with the thought at Jesus. And this act must last, in order to become accustomed to go there and to stay there. Of course, retaining the mind within heart for a longer time it is no longer accomplished only by prolonging the inhaling, but also by delaying the exhaling. But this recommendation it wasn't done more aprioristically by Nicephorus the Monk. But it was done by Gregory of Sinai, in his Method, which, on one hand, it takes this recommendation from the Method of Simeon of the New Theologian, of holding the inhaling, and on the other hand it draws the necessary conclusion of breathing more rarely, and it shows also what this is necessary for in order the mind to remain longer within heart. If Nicephorus shows what one can push his mind like, towards his heart, Gregory of Sinai shows how by exhaling more rarely the mind can be hold within heart." (Stăniloae 1992: 224-225)

Behold the Method of Gregory of Sinai for using the Heart's Prayer:

"By seating since morning to evening on a stool approximately ten centimeters wide, gather your mind out of rationality, into your heart, and keep it there. Bend with toil your chest, your shoulders, and your neck, in order to feel a great pain and perseveringly shout out with your mind or with your soul: "Lord, Jesus Christ, have mercy on me". Then, by moving your thought at the other half, say: "Son of God, have mercy on me". And by uttering for many time this half, do not change the halves easily and continuously. This is because the plants replanted often they do not make roots. Retain your breathing's movement in order not to breathe easily. This is because of the breeze of the air coming out from the heart it darkens the mind and it kidnaps the cogitation, taking the mind away from there and giving the mind prisoner to the forgetfulness, or making the mind to cross from a thought to another, and then ending without realizing in the inappropriate things. And when you will see the filthiness of the evil ghosts, or of the thoughts, appearing or being imagined in your mind, have no fear; even if clean images of the things will appear to you do not pay attention to them, but, but keeping your breathing as long as you can, and by locking up your mind into your heart, and by continuously and perseveringly invoking the name of Jesus Christ, you burn them down quickly and destroy them, by defeating them with the godlike name. This is for John Climacus says: Defeat the enemies with the name of Jesus, for there is no more powerful weapon in heavens and on earth". (Stăniloae 1992: 226)

"In what concerns the uttering of the Heart's Prayer: "some people, says Gregory of Sinai, they recommend to be uttered with the mouth, other with the mind. I recommend both ways, for sometimes the mind cannot utter the prayer because of being overwhelmed with worries, and some other times the mouth cannot utter the prayer. That's why you must pray with both your mouth and your mind. But in order to do that you must live in quietude and not agitated, lest the voice by disturbing the feeling and the mind's attention to impede them. This will be, until the mind by getting accustomed to this work, it will advance and it will receive power from the Ghost in order to be able to pray wholly and perseveringly. Then you won't need to speak with your mouth, but it won't be possible too; then it will be enough to commit the work with your mind".

This would be what the Method of Simeon the New Theologian calls it as the fourth degree of the prayer. The rule of the breathing is only a means partially helping to the mind's turning towards itself. The mind is steadfastly turned towards itself by the godlike Ghost Who work can be felt after we have been striving ourselves for achieving the clean prayer. "Nobody will be able, says Gregory of Sinai, to keep the mind by himself, if the Ghost doesn't keep it. This is because by transgressing the commandments, the mind slipping from there and getting separated from God, it is carried away everywhere like a prisoner. Restrain your mind and hold your breathing, by clenching your mouth, but only partially, and then it gets again scattered away. But when the work of the prayer comes, then it truly keeps the mind with itself and it fills the mind with joy and it sets the mind free from slavery." (Stăniloae 1992: 227)

"One must retain his breathing, according to Gregory of Sinai, for delaying the quick or sudden getting out of the air from heart, a fact that causes a darkening of the mind, or a getting out of the mind from within. Actually, a quick and noisy breathing, on one hand it doesn't give the cogitation time to gradually focus upon the interior, and on the other hand it draws the attention upon it, getting the attention out. That's why is good that both the inhaling and the exhaling to be done long and without making noises. If the one who prays accustoms himself to this quiet and rare rhythm of the breathing, the breathing no longer bothers him, but it serves him only for focusing his mind inwardly. That one forgets about breathing, though its breathing helps him focusing." (Stăniloae 1992: 227)

"Gregory of Sinai is the first to tell us that the short prayer addressed to Jesus it must be divided in two parts, and each half must be uttered for a long time. Actually, if one says the prayer wholly for each time, he will force the attention to take heed to too many words and the mind won't be able to focus." (Stăniloae 1992: 228)

"Saint Gregory Palamas while defending in his writing the ones who use auxiliary means for praying, he doesn't reckon these auxiliary means as absolutely necessary but only useful in some measure to the beginners. And that's why not all the Holy Fathers recommend these auxiliary means of prayer." (Stăniloae 1992: 228)

"In the writing of Kallistos and Ignatius are given new specifications upon the way which one must achieve the gathering of the mind in his heart, and to reach his whole mind's focusing in the Heart's Prayer. By and large, the writing presents the Method of Nicephorus, but it is no stranger to those of Simeon the New Theologian and Gregory of Sinai, for it recommend the seating on a narrow stool (Gregory of Sinai) and in a corner of the room (Simeon the New Theologian)." (Stăniloae 1992: 228)

"The specifications brought by Kallistos and Ignatius are these ones:

"After the sun has set, by calling the almighty Lord, Jesus Christ, to help you, seat down on a little stool, in a quiet monastic cell, not lightened. And by gathering your mind from the usual outwardly roving, and by peacefully pushing your mind inwardly by inhaling the air, keep the prayer of "Lord, Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me", namely introducing somehow, in the same time with the breathing, in a unitary mode, the prayer's words too". They recommend that, in the same time with cogitating at these words, one must cogitate also at death, at judgment, at the reward for the good deeds, and to the punishment for the evil deeds; and the one who prays to reckon about himself that he is the most sinful amongst people and even more unclean than the devils. Thus, by cogitating at the eternal torments which we will endure, the one who prays starts feeling his heart pricked and he starts shedding tears. If the tears still do not come, let him persevere until they will. This is for the tears wash away the passions and the defilements. "And if the tears do not come to you, seat and pay attention to such cogitations interwoven with the prayer, for an hour. Then, by getting yourself up, sing attentively the religious service after dinner. And the, by seating again, keep the prayer with the whole your power, cleanly and in a non-scattered manner, namely without worrying and without any thought and hallucinations, with much taking vigil, for a half an hour" (Greek Philokalia, Second Edition, volume II, p. 365).

They recommend the same for morning, namely one to focus for an hour upon clean prayer, and then to do a song prayer, and then for another half an hour to do the clean prayer. (Stăniloae 1992: 229)

"By and large, the monk must pray ceaselessly. "It is better for him to choose death, than to remain without prayer even for a moment", because "is dead the soul that doesn't move towards prayer" and "the one who prays he is dialoguing with God" (Greek Philokalia, Second Edition, volume II, p. 367). But the mind cannot whenever focus in clean prayer, a prayer lacking any thought, to which serve the as auxiliary and preparatory means recommendations from the Methods for uttering the Heart's Prayer." (Stăniloae 1992: 229)

"One mustn't wait until he will be consolidated in dispassion in order to try to focus in the clean prayer. The progress in dispassion and the progress in the clean prayer they both take place simultaneously. At the beginning, one can achieve with great toils a few moments of clean prayer and immediately

there occur thoughts which he must fight against. "But the one who has reached the measure of the spiritual age he is imparted with the clean and not-scattered prayer from within heart, with the godlike love, and thus he becomes consummate and steadfast in the spiritual prayer and he is made partaker to the unmediated ecstasy and to the kidnapping in awe and to the union with the desired One due to the perfect love". (Stăniloae 1992: 229-230)

"The recommendations of the Methods for praying, with the difficulties which they describe, are addressed mostly to the ones who are at the beginning of the efforts for achieving the clean prayer, namely to the ones who haven't reached yet a full dispassion. Only to the beginners is recommended also the uttering of all the words of the Heart's Prayer. The progressed ones remain only to utter the name of Jesus, and the progressed ones remain to ceaselessly remembering the name of Jesus in their mind. While everybody is urged to often call Jesus, or to utter the Heart's Prayer, only the consummate ones reach the state of perpetual clean prayer." (Stăniloae 1992: 230)

"More detailed explanations regarding the old physiological recommendations, which actually can be reduced to turning our look toward our chest and to breathing rarely, we are given by Nicodemus the Hagiorite, the learned churchly writer from the XVIII Century.

Concerning the first aspect Nicodemus said: "You know that any work had a natural relation with the being and with the power which sets it in function and it naturally turns towards those and it unites with them. So, when the mind's work is liberated from any world's exterior things, by guarding the senses and the imagination, it must be brought back to its being and power, in other words the mind must be made to enter the heart, which is the organ of the mind's being and power. This turning of the mind, the beginners must accustom themselves to do it..., by leaning down their head and by leaning their chin against the upper part of their chest". By turning the mind upon itself, the mind becomes one and by itself it ascends to the cogitation at God. By entering the heart, the mind mustn't be allowed to do anything, but the mind must be given, towards cogitation, the Heart's Prayer.

But Nicodemus didn't simply repeat the idea of Diadochus, but he gives the idea some explanations:

"After the mind has entered the heart, the mind must no longer contemplate, the mind must do nothing more, but by finding the interior rationality which we are reasoning and composing works of art with, let's judge on ourselves and let's examine on ourselves, and we read books in silence without the mouth to speak out..., not to allow it to say anything else except this short prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me".

But this isn't enough. One must also put in movement the soul's power of will, in other words, one must say this prayer with the whole his will, power, and love. I want to explain this more clearly: the internal rationality must pay attention, both with its mental sight and with its mental hearing, not only to the works of this prayer but even more to the things this prayer signifies, and it must do that by remaining limitless, without images, without representations, without cogitating to something else, neither sensitive nor intelligible, neither from inside or from outside, even be it a good thing. This is because God is outside all of these, so that the mind when trying to unite itself with God in prayer, it must get out of all existing things, either sensitive or intelligible, and to ascend above all things, in order to obtain the godlike union. As about will, it must be attached wholly to the words of the prayer, so that the mind, the rationality, and the will, these three parts of the soul to be one and The One to be threefold. For this is the way which the man, being the image of the Holy Trinity, he is attached and he is united with his prototype. So said the great hero and master of the prayer and of the mind's watchfulness, namely the great Gregory Palamas: "When the mind's unity becomes trinity while remaining in unity, then it is united with the Trinitarian monad of the godhead, by closing the gate to any deviation and by keeping itself above the body and above the world and above the master of this world."

Therefore, Nicodemus the Hagiorite, by starting from the turning of the look towards the chest, which is to the beginners a means making them easier to detach they cogitation from the external things and to focus the cogitation upon itself, upon the own indefinite, it finds the occasion to show how the road towards contemplating God crosses through the liberation of the mind from the narrowing accommodated to the finite objects and through finding out the own indefinite. So, the focusing towards this infinite it is in the same time a focusing of all faculties towards the godlike infinite. This unification of the mind in its indefinite it isn't done at once, but through a previous setting in work on this purpose of all the mental faculties: the mind itself, the rationality, and the will. The mind would be the general supra-looking of the understanding work, the rationality would be the discursive cogitation highlighting each element of the cogitated whole and it establishes the reports amongst them, and the will is the loving directing of this cogitated whole towards Jesus. Therefore, at the beginning it isn't enough only a indistinct meditation upon the prayer's words, but it is necessary to highlight all the meanings comprised in the prayer, which are existential meanings awakening the will's loving attachment of the to Christ. From this both rational and existential analysis, of all the meanings comprised in this prayer, we are elevated to an embracing and unitary contemplation of the content of this prayer, directed towards Christ with the whole our love.

Actually, the unified mind which Nicodemus the Hagiorite wants us to ascent to, in order us to see God through that unified mind, by not being a state of motionless abstraction, it isn't else but our mind ardent due to its love for God and aware of its own sinfulness. Towards this state want us to be elevated Kallistos and Ignatius and Kallistos the Katafygiote, another author from Philokalia. And the sign that we have reached there it is the abundant tears.

To this mind's focusing too, it must serve also the keeping of the breathing during the prayer. Here, Nicodemus the Hagiorite brought, in addition to the previous explanations, also a specification which we haven't met it before: the breathing mustn't be done in a perfect continuation like our nature has been previously accustomed to, but the breathing must be retained for a little until the internal rationality says the whole prayer, crossing with its meditation, of course, to all the prayer's words. For a total interruption of the breathing process cannot take place, especially between inhaling and exhaling, when it seems that Nicodemus the Hagiorite would want to place the uttering of the prayer, we believe that it still is about prolonging the inhaling a little over than usual. His specification consists of the fact that the words' uttering it is attached to inhaling and not to exhaling, for, according to the old methods of praying, through inhaling the cogitation is turned towards interior. During the exhaling it is better to be silent, in order to be possible to retain the cogitation inside, and in order not to be its attention kidnapped by the flow of the air.

This retaining of prolonging of the inhaling a little over than usual it causes also some kind of discomfort, of pain, of sufferance to the heart, said Nicodemus the Hagiorite, which on one hand makes our heart humble, it makes is thinner, and it breaks it, so that it banishes out of it the poison of the pleasure, and on the other hand it makes our heart to attract towards itself the attention of the mental powers. Therefore, the retaining of the breathing, in addition to the fact that it prolongs the mind's focusing act inwardly, it produces that existential state too, of humbleness and crushing to tears, which the mind must gain it to itself, by gathering itself whole before the unseen Christ, but Who is felt as present.

About this bodily pain must speak even Palamas, in order to show its use, against Barlaam; Barlaam conceived the state of prayer as a state of pure comfortable intellectuality, unlike the Eastern Fathers who conceived it as intertwined with existential elements of gentleness, of humbleness, of tears, of felt physical pain and in the same time of joy overflowing from the soul's deep. Only in ecstasy, on the supreme level of the prayer, of even beyond that level, it ceases any bodily feeling." (Stăniloae 1992: 230-233)

"Almost all the authors who wrote about the Prayer Method knew, beside the more complicated method of retaining the breathing and of turning the look towards chest, also a simple method consisting of simply but increasingly often uttering the words; "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me the sinner". This consists of, the method attributed to Saint John Chrysostom and another method attributed to Saint Simeon the New Theologians and to Nicephorus the Monk. The last one establishes also the reports between this simpler method and the complicated method: the one who cannot start with the complicated method, let him start with simply and increasingly often uttering the Heart's Prayer.

This simpler method was practiced during the XIX Century in Russia not only by monks, but also by the so-called pilgrims, or pious people who, by renouncing to everything, they were walking all over Russia spreading the word of God; this simpler prayer method was practiced even by the people living a common life in society. This spreading of the Heart's Prayer amongst the large social classes of the Russian believers, it is described under the form of pilgrim confessions, by one who was practicing it, in a little book entitles: The Confessions of a Pilgrim towards His Spiritual Guide. The author wanted to remain anonymous. The book was printed in Kazan in the year 1883, by the abbot of Saint Michael Monastery; he copied the book after a manuscript found by him on Athos Mountain. The story seems to be connected with the époque of the Crimean war, and to the liberation of the slaves, namely the period between the years 1856-1860.

According to this little book, the whole development of the spiritual life from its beginning to the highest levels, it is being done on the thread of the Heart's Prayer. The spiritual life starts with orally uttering the Heart's Prayer for short periods of time, being deepened and being purified on the measure it is being uttered more often, more interiorized, and more by itself.

In the Russian Pilgrim's stories the Heart's Prayer crosses through three stages. The first stage is that of simply uttering it, at the beginning for three thousand times, and then for six thousand times, and then for twelve thousand times, and finally: all the time. After a while, its practitioner can pass to the method attributed to Simeon the New Theologian, by searching with his imagination for the place of his heart and by regulating his breathing, in order to synchronize the prayer's words to the heart's beatings and to the breathing rhythm. But he still hasn't reached the mental prayer. One reaches this prayer when the mind prays by itself, totally without words, as a permanent movement of the mind, parallel to the heart's beatings. If the two stages are usually called the Heart's Prayer, the third stage is called as the mental prayer or the clean prayer. Consequently, the Heart's Prayer gradually becomes mental prayer, though the content of the mental prayer it still is Jesus.

The synchronization obtains in the second stage it constitutes an explanation brought to the old methods, though it isn't excluded that it existed in the old practices too, even if the old methods do not mention it specifically. The synchronization to the heart's beatings consists of an uttering or of thinking at each prayer's word on a heart's beating. This can be done after the practitioner of the Heart's Prayer becomes accustomed to represent his heart's place and to hear his heart's beatings. Behold what the Russian pilgrim initiates a blind man in this synchronization like: "After I read to him from Philokalia the necessary things, he started begging me to show him what he can find his heart with his mind like, and what can he introduce the godlike name of Jesus Christ in his heart like. So, I started to explain him: "Behold, you cannot see anything now, but you can imagine and you can represent with your mind the things you were seeing before, for instance a man of a certain thing, or one of your limbs as there would be your hand or your leg, and you can represent it so vividly like you would see it in a material manner in front of you. Can you direct, in this way, your eyes, even if they are blind, towards that limb of yours?"- "Yes, I can." Answered the blind man. "Then, you represent exactly like that, your heart, and direct your eyes towards there, like you would cross through your chest with your sight, and represent your heart to yourself as vividly as you can, but also listen carefully with your ear too, as your heart moves and as it beats on each time. If you have focused yourself in this, start uttering on each heart's beating, while looking at your heart, the prayer's words. On the first beating say or cogitate at the word "Lord, on the second one "Jesus", on the third one "Christ, on the fourth one "Have mercy", and on the fifth one "on me", and repeat these as long as you can" (pp. 149-150).

After getting accustomed to this synchronization, one starts doing the synchronization with the breathing too. This one take place in another mode: during inhaling it is uttered the first half of the prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ", and during exhaling, the second half: "have mercy on me".

This synchronization cannot be achieved except by prolonging the breathing, so that the duration of the inhaling to correspond to at least three heart beatings, while the first words of the prayer are uttered. After certain practice, the practitioner so totally unites his breathing and his heart's beatings with the word of the Heart's Prayer, or with the thought at these words, so that there is no longer heart beating or breathing not to be intertwined with the prayer's words. The prayer becomes a breathing of the life, of the soul.

If this synchronization consisted only in getting accustomed to uttering the prayer's words simultaneously to the heart and to the breathing, it could become something mechanical. But the main accent is not on words but on thinking at each word until, in the phase of the mental prayer the uttering ceases and there remains only their meaning's repetition with the thought. This repetition with the understanding it becomes an uninterrupted habit. Parallel to the body's breathing it takes place as another breathing the uninterrupted thinking at Jesus, intertwined with feeling the heart. Then "the name of the Lord it has been seeded within heart" as says the Method attributed to Saint John Chrysostom, or "the heart has swallowed the Lord and the Lord the heart, so that both of them have become one" and the heart cannot beat without the mind to cogitate at the Lord, like the eye cannot look at a thing without the mind seeing that thing. "And finally, after about five months, I felt that the prayer unfolded within me without any constraint from my part, and it was being performed by the mind and by the heart not only in the state of watchfulness but even during my sleep it was being done likewise, and the prayer it was no longer interrupted by anything, not even for a moment, no matter what I was doing". So, only the mental prayer it is truly an uninterrupted prayer. "Nothing was impeded by this prayer and nothing was bothering this prayer. If I have something to do and the prayer unveils within my heart by itself, that thing will go quicker; if I listen to something or if I read something, the prayer won't stop and I feel in the same time both of them, as I would have been divided in two or I would have two souls in my chest".

This prayer's effects are astonishing: "After some three weeks, I started feeling a pain in my heart, then warmth, a peace, and a very pleasant quietude. Sometimes I felt like a trembling in my heart. My heart was so light, to free, and so comforted. Sometimes I felt a fiery love for Jesus Christ and for the entire creation of God. Sometimes started flowing from my eyes, by themselves, tears of gratitude to God Who shared to me – to the sinner – such a gift. Sometimes my so cumbersome understanding was illuminated, so that I easily comprised things I couldn't even have thought at before... I was experiencing an illumination of my rationality, a penetration into Scripture, and an understanding of the ghost of the creation". "When I started to pray with my heart all the surroundings appeared to me in a charming form: the trees, the grass, the birds, the air, the light, all of them seemed to me as talking to me, and that they were here for I was a human being, that they were confessing the God's love for man and that everything was praying, that everything was praising God. Then I understood what means the word from Philokalia: "understanding the ghost of the creatures". And I saw the way one should go on, in order to reach to dialogue with the God's creatures". (Stăniloae 1992: 233-236)

"By following, especially the affirmations of Saint Mark the Ascetic, we considered that our heart, or our intimacy has Christ within – or in continuation with our heart – since the beginning (obviously, not a continuation of substance but of presence). It is enough descending within our heart and to contemplate within our heart or in connection with our heart the infinite abyss of the godlike presence of Jesus. But the methods of the Heart's Prayer let the impression that the heart wouldn't have Jesus in the beginning, but we must bring Him there by prayer. By taking a closer look, we can see than in these methods it is actually about the name of Jesus. With this name we must knock on the heart's door in order the heart to open, and we must make this name sound within heart by repeating it ceaselessly within our heart. Christ Who is within our heart, He opens for us for we are calling His name, for we show Him that we need Him. But our need for Him it is awakened within us by some feeling of His sweetness as close to us. He is the One making us calling upon Him. The name of Jesus is the thought at Jesus. And the fact that a person thinks at another person it is the witness of a mysterious connection and the means of intensifying this connection. When I feel the need for thinking at somebody, usually that person is the one causing within me, by influencing me from distance, this thought about him, as by thinking at that person in a voluntary manner I am sending him a wave from me.” (Stăniloae 1992: 246-247)

“According to Saint Gregory Palamas and to Saint Isaac the Syrian, the mental prayer culminates in a stopping of the cogitation, namely of the mind’s work.

This moment of mind’s stopping it isn’t the seeing of the godlike Light, but it is a feeling of His presence, caused by His power. The question is: what can one experience like, this ceasing of the mental activity and which the signs characterizing it are? As we said, the mind when reaching in front of itself during the clean prayer, it experiences a certain astonishment both in front of its own indefinite and especially in front of divine limitless and sovereignty which the mind feels as present. So, this experience has both a negative and a positive side.

The negative side consists of the mentioned astonishment; the positive side consists of feeling the divine presence and sovereignty.” (Stăniloae 1992: 247-248) a) This stopping takes place for the mind has reached the top of all the received objects of the cogitation and the mind has renounced to any understanding which is somewhat defined, for the mind has realized that any defined cogitation cannot aim at God. Actually, the mind’s movement or activity it consists of its desire of defining, of specifying some meanings, namely what the mind knows. But this specification fits only the finite, created meanings. When the mind renounced to the preoccupation with the created and finite things, and when the mind is in front of God, then the mind realizes that there is no point in this activity of it, but, on the opposite, it realizes that this activity is damaging to the mind because of lowering the mind back to the finite things.

“There are the following characteristics of the stopping of the mental activity:

This stopping is caused by the experience of the divine indefinite or infinite. Without this, the mind wouldn’t leave all the finite meanings and it wouldn’t persist in this state. This stopping cannot be achieved until the mind doesn’t overwhelmingly feel the presence of the divine infinity. This stopping is superior to the negative theology that still thinks at the concepts which it denies.

b) From here come out two things: on one hand, experiencing God through the mind’s lack of movements it is superior to the knowledge achieved through the affirmative or negative activity, but just this shows that, on the other hand, this lack of movements isn’t a simple inertia and insensitiveness, but it is experiencing the divine reality which the mind tries to define it even more; it turns out that this state is a state of prayer, of a prayer that is full of silent amazement, full of helplessness in defining what it asks for and of defining the One Whom it asks from, and Whom the mind feels as listening to itself.

Although this state is a state superior to the prayer, it still is called as prayer, for it is given to the worthy ones during their prayer and its source is the prayer.

c) The mind left everything behind even its own activity that still was turning the mind towards things. The mind is now in front of the Master, at the edge of the earth, looking intensely and in awe at the ocean of life comprised in Him.

Before this the mind wasn't capable of launching by its own powers, and now it cannot and it doesn't want to turn back. The mind stays now like at His imposing and fluid gate, which the mind cannot enter through. The mind's state can be characterized as an overwhelming amazement. The amazement ties the mind to this ocean, but in the same time it paralyzes the mind so that the mind can no longer work. The mind wants to advance but it cannot. That's why the mind begs for the help from God. This shows us that this stopping of the mind before the Emperor's Gate, or before the ocean surrounding Him, it isn't the last level of knowing God. Our spiritual ascension doesn't stop either at this second degree apophatism, or to this ecstasy of the quietude, in knowing God. But the mind will ascend further only by the full coming of the Ghost Who will elevate the mind to see the godlike world.

Out of the ocean of the divine greatness it emanates a spell making the mind to forget about the things behind, and that it keeps the mind's gaze aiming to it, a spell that is so overwhelming that it paralyzes the mind's movements despite the mind's deep longing for advancing.

d) The fact that the mind has renounced to everything and that it stays still, praying for to be sent to it the boat which to take the mind offshore, which to open the gate for the mind, it unveils a state of great love towards the divine infinity. All over, the prayer is the manifestation of the love for God. And for this love does not cease either now, nor it ceases the longing for more, this state still is a state of prayer, but it is an undefined prayer.

e) The more the prayer's warmth grows up, the more the love grows up too, in order to reach the fullness in clean prayer, the highest level of the prayer. This love, by still remaining after ceasing the prayer, but like indefinite prayer, it will constitute, together with the Ghost Who has come to help, the bridge of crossing from the edge of the created shore in the ocean's off shore. This is for this prayer, by being well established in the man's being, it wants to launch itself in the off shore of the ocean of God's love too. But this longing is satisfied when the mind will be kidnapped by the godlike light that descends from the divine Being. The bridged itself is thrown within us by God. But godlike light could penetrate within us for our being has opened, full of longing, to the bridge thrown by God, through a longer work. So it was possible for the godlike bridge to be well established within the man's spiritual being. We discern between the love as longer process, a process due to God but also to our own effort, and the love as an unseen wave overblown suddenly from above. The first one has grown up during the whole ascesis and illumination and especially during the prayer and, on the moment of the mind's stopping, to reach the amazement in front of the divine unexplainable and infinite mystery. This still is a state of desiring love, but which no longer is able to advance through any our effort towards the divine greatness. On the moment of the mental activity's stopping, this love for God has reached an ultimate firmness and warmth that can be hold through our effort, in order the godlike light launched from the other realm, by descending within our mind, to set it in fire, to get it drunk, and by this to open to our mind the light of the godlike inside. This amazed love, which is the positive content of the state of stopping of the mental work, cannot still be called as the last resting of the mind. This is for in its still is the longing for union with God, a longing that has reached the culminant level. It is right that the mind, by being outside the finite things and concepts, it mustn't any longer to pass from one to another in its longing to unite with God, but it stops in a steadfast amazement in feeling the still covered Limitless. But on the other hand, it asks for being given as answer the showing of the godlike Limitless in light. This discovery presupposes, as preparation from the man's part, the love for God gained during a longer time and increased especially during prayer until the culminant stopping of the mind in front of the godlike Boundless.

The godlike light isn't caught by this firm, awaken, warm love itself, grown up through affirmative and negative reasoning about God and through the full of feeling prayer and now stopped in amazement, but in this state of a soul prepared for a long time and it descends at once, as a gift exclusively from above, the love for God as overwhelming drunkenness that kidnaps the soul from the self. While the first love belonged to the previous phases of the ascension, as being due to the human effort too, it waits for being kidnapped beyond itself in the union with God, in a state of fiery, drunk, ecstatic love. It waits not only to see God as a sun mirrored in itself – in the sense used by Saint Gregory of Nyssa – but to be kidnapped in the interior itself of the transcendent sun.

This knowing of God beyond our own deeps, when the own subject is no longer directly seen and the divine subject is no longer seen indirectly, but vice versa, by taking place after the total getting out of the mind from itself, beyond itself, through the suspension of all the mind's natural works and by being kidnapped by the Holy Ghost, knowledge that is one with the love, it is what it was expressed in East through seeing the godlike light.

f) Experiencing of feeling the divine, boundless mystery, the state of infinite prayer and the warm and firm love for God, are other characteristics which make this apophatism differing from the negative theology in which it is rather active the intellect.

Besides these, one cannot reach this experience without an appeasement of all his worries, namely the ones meant to produce pleasure or everything that can cause pain and needs. Once one has reached the feeling of this godlike ocean, this feeling will master the man with so much charm, that the man remains serene in tasting it, not being attracted by anything from outside. Although, there is in this feeling too, and therefore in the quietude produced by it, a progress. Out of the godlike Boundless, even if He is felt as covered in darkness, the mind learns more and more meanings.” (Stăniloae 1992: 249-253)

“The spiritual man reaches an even greater quietude when he is elevated to seeing the godlike light. This is for even there exists an advancement in this too, accompanied by a fiery love, on the other hand it is an appeasement from any work of the own being and from any worldly worries.” (Stăniloae 1992: 253)

“Summarizing the aspects related to the methods for easing the mind’s focusing while doing the Heart’s Prayer, we will say that:

a) These methods aren’t regarded as absolutely necessary, but they only are auxiliary means to the ones accustomed to gather their mind within themselves and to uninterruptedly utter the words of the Heart’s Prayer. The one who tries to ceaselessly used this prayer he ascertains that without at least focusing his attention on breathing, he won’t be able to focus much either on uttering the prayer, or, in any case, he will need to make a greater effort with his attention. The breathing with its permanent unfolding by itself, it is a supporting string in order to focus the attention. If we use to associate the uttering of the Heart’s Prayer with the breathing, it will be much easier to us to keep this prayer permanently.

b) But until one tries these methods, he must be accustomed to utter in a simpler and more non-systematic, but increasingly often and with his thought focused, either the whole Heart’s Prayer or at least one or two words of this prayer (Jesus!, Lord Jesus!, Lord Jesus Christ!, Jesus, have mercy on me!). In the same time he should have been progressed in liberating himself of passions and of worries.

c) Neither are we on the highest levels of the spiritual life on the moment which we start applying the recommendations of these methods, so we are, in a certain regard, as beginners while applying these recommendations and while we cross through diverse phases. In the beginning we can apply but one or two of these recommendations. Some people will remain the whole their live at this much. Others, in time, they will apply all of these recommendations.

d) The prayer from these phases it still isn’t the mental prayer, but it is the Heart’s Prayer. The Heart’s Prayer will become mental prayer when the words are no longer needed, neither are the methods, but the mind is occupied ceaselessly together with the heart, with Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1992: 236-237)

“If in the negative theology we make abstraction of the world only through rationality and neither is this total, for by denying an attribute to God we think at what we deny, in the mental prayer which we turn ourselves away from everything through, and which we sink in ourselves through, we make an existential abstraction through everything we are, and that is about a total and lasting abstraction. In the prayer which the mind does it within heart, we no longer deny the world and think at the world in the same time, but we simply totally forget about world with the whole our being. We are the only ones left, and namely not us the ones from surface, but our self from deep, undefined, non-narrowed by thinking at things, our self that cannot be looked or defined by any concept, so that we remain only with the simple awareness of our self's presence, of our indefinable reality." (Stăniloae 1992: 237)

"The heart which the mind gathers within, it is not so much the flesh heart, but it is the central headquarters of the mind, the man's center, the man's ghost, the man's subject, the total man from inside, not only the intellectual man but also the sentimental man. These are the man's inner chambers "where there are no longer winds of the evil thoughts", it is the chamber from inside the iconostasis where our Lord Jesus Christ has been dwelling since our Baptism.

There we are striving to go with our cogitation through prayer, and that place has no delimitation but it opens infinite perspectives; that's why we must strive to ever deeply penetrate there, ever more inwardly. And this is done by our cogitation by leaving all the sensitive images, all the defined concepts, and all the imaginings. "In prayer, said Saint Gregory Palamas, The mind gradually rejects the relations with the existing things, firstly the relations connecting the mind to the reproachable things, to the evil things, and to the corruptible things, and then it reject the things from the middle (the creation by and large, which stays in the middle between mind and God, Dumitru Stăniloae's note), being an advice from the Fathers not to accept the knowledge which the enemy makes it to appear while we pray, in order us not to be robbed of what is higher. Therefore, the mind, by gradually rejecting these relations, as also the relations with the higher things, it wholly gets out of all the existing things, during the clean prayer. This getting out it is much higher than the theology by negation" (Word III, Triad III, The Romanian Philokalia, volume VII, p. 309-310)." (Stăniloae 1992: 237-238)

"The Holy Fathers said that surpassing all the sensitive and intelligible things it is a sine qua non condition for the mind to get closer to the infinite God. For instance, in a scholium at Saint Maximos the Confessor they said: "The sensitive things and the intelligible things are in the middle between God and people. By ascending above to them, the mind gets closer to God non-enslaved by the sensitive thing to activity and unimpeded by the intelligible thing in contemplation". But this surpassing is much more fully achieved in prayer than in the negative theology. We know that the mind cannot stay either for an instant without being preoccupied with something, namely without a content. The difficult problem is how it is possible having in the same time a content and still leaving everything that is define and that it defines the mind, namely everything that is imprinting of the sensitive and intelligible world? The negative theology denies this content while still imagining it and thinking at it, alike the smoker is discontent with the tobacco but he still is smoking it. The prayer is the only one succeeding in fully achieving this, by the fact that it removed from within mind any defined content but it gives the mind the preoccupation with the infinite, with God, namely it feels the mind up, positively and experimentally with the apophatic.” (Stăniloae 1992: 238)

“Through the resurrection of Christ, we are shown that we must not expect after our death the darkness of the nothingness, but we must expect more light. That’s why, every time we do the remembrance of our deceased fellow humans, we accompany that with a lit-up candle. We know that the dead one he is alive with his soul, and therefore he in into light, and we can make, through the prayers we utter for him, and through the love we show thus to him, him to be in even more light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 145)

“The people show that they live the encounter with God-the Person in dialogue, on the basis of unveiling His as Person Who answer them by giving them what they ask for in their prayers. This is for through prayer, one doesn’t speak only about God, but he addresses himself directly to God. If God, by revealing Himself, He addresses Himself as First Person to the human being as second person, in prayer the roles are inversed, for the man speaks as the first person to God as second Person. Both these highlight the human being’s value, in his quality as partner elevated to the height of the dialogue with God; both of them show God as Person, paying attention to the human being’s person, both in what He asks the human being to do, by showing His joy for the human being’s obedience, and through taking heed at the human being’s request.” (Stăniloae 1995: 157)

“The prayer cannot be addressed except to a God-Person, and not to a nature obeying its own rules. They said that the prayer would humiliate the human being. Actually, God grants a great honor to the human being, by listening what the human being asks Him for, and giving by that, to the human being, the power to get out from the slavery of the nature’s laws, like the human being cannot do in pantheism. In the pantheistic religions, there is no prayer, because the human being cannot defeat or exceed the nature’s laws, because there is no God- Person-Absolute as Master upon the nature’s laws and as giving the man too, the power for dominating those laws, if the man asks for it. Only a God Who has revealed Himself through speaking, He is Person, and only Him gives a base to the prayer, as direct addressing of the people towards Him. Only such a God can grant the people the honor of having, at their turn, the initiative for accomplishing this dialogue with Him, God showing Himself as always ready to listen to the human being. That's why, the prayer is the highest mode for the human being's transcending towards the God-Person Who is totally superior to the human being and to the nature. God Who has unveiled Himself, through Revelation, as Person, He descended amongst people out of His attention towards them, and he continues doing that also in listening to the human being's prayer. If through creation the human being is, in an untold manner, lower than God, through prayer, God elevates the human being on the level as His equal dialogue partner. Only the Person can descend out of His own initiative and only the Person can make the person whom He descends to, to ascend at His height. That's why, only being helped by Revelation and by prayer, the human being really transcends on himself and the nature, for he is elevated thus at the height as God's partner. A prayer is being practiced also in Mosaic religion and in Islamism, for they too believe in God as Person. But the consummate height of the human being on the level of God, one cannot speak except in Christendom, where the Son of God makes Himself man, but he remains God too." (Stăniloae 1995: 157-158)

"In prayer, as in the word told by a human being to another human being, it is manifested the character as person of the human being. But while in the word told to another human being, either of teaching or of encouragement, it is manifested in addition to the human being's relation with God, also his relations with his fellow human, in prayer it is directly manifested the relation of the human being, with the Person-Absolute. Only the created person can pray, and the request can be addressed only to the Person-Absolute, even if the man can ask for something, also other conscious created persons. One cannot pray the essence for something and one cannot address his prayer to the essence. Within essence everything moves according to some laws. The power of some parts of the essence can be surpassed by the power of other parts of the essence. But here are not about personal reports: of mercy, of love, of freedom, which can be stronger than the powers manifested in the essence's laws. The prayer and the answer to the prayer belong to another way of existence; they belong to the superior mode of the relation amongst persons. In answering the prayer by the Person-Absolute, it is shown again the value the Person-Absolute has given to the created person, and also the freedom and the power the Person-Absolute has, through Himself, upon nature, better said the absolute communion between persons. Some philosophers, by despising the prayer because of being a manifestation of human humility, they follow some pantheistic conception, which the human being doesn't have in, actually, any freedom and any value, but in it, the human being is only a piece in a complicated mechanism." (Stăniloae 1995: 159)

“The prayer’s power is stronger than the natural laws, than the essence’s laws. It is stronger for it is addressed to God-Person, above the laws of an essence reckoned by some people as the unique foundation of everything that exists. That’s why, the prayer’s power doesn’t consist of the greater power of some essence’s part upon other essence’s parts, as in the case of the witchcraft. The prayer’s power consists of being listened to and fulfilled by God-Person Who is superior to the universe’s essence, as the Almighty Subject is superior to the object. The one who prays he trusts this power of God-Person. The prayer’s power comes out of the human being’s faith in God, and not out of some powers hidden in the general essence that is within the human being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 159-160)

“The prayer is addressed to God as to a supreme You, or as to a supreme Him, and the prayer is not a craftsmanship of the human being for triggering a certain power in his nature or in the universe’s nature. In prayer, it isn’t set in movement an impersonal force, towards the union with another impersonal force, or against another impersonal force. In prayer, the human being isn’t alone, of better said, it is not manifested a movement that seems to belong to a sole person, and which only apparently and passingly to belong to the human being. In prayer there isn’t the resignation in a fatality, that only passingly lets the impression of being possible to be changed.” (Stăniloae 1995: 160)

“The prayer is a human being’s relation with the Person-Absolute, and loving, of the Trinity. The prayer testifies about the attention paid by the Absolute, as community of Persons, to the existence created as person. In prayer, the human person is encouraged by the loving Absolute-Persons of the Trinity, above all the laws, in order to draw the Trinity’s attention upon him in order the Trinity to help him to defeat the natural laws. It is a special honor granted by Trinity to the created person, by not letting the human being to be the slave of the general nature, and by encouraging the human person to address his prayer to the Trinity, so that, by this, it is cultivated the human being’s personal relation with the Holy Trinity. Through prayer, it is shown the fact that the human being is created to be somebody, in front of the Absolute Trinitarian Persons. God can work, through the praying human person, His own wonders, or deed which are above all the nature’s laws.” (Stăniloae 1995: 160)

“Like God has created the human being as capable of understanding through his mind the direct or the revealed God’s word, likewise He has created the human being as capable of making himself through prayer, as together-subject of His above nature deeds; the mind and the organs of the human body are capable of receiving and of serving, as organs of fulfilling and communication, the powers from above the human being, namely from God. The human being’s mind is elevated and it is widened in order to catch up the meanings communicated by God; the organs of the human being's body are imprinted by the spirituality of the godlike powers which are superior to the nature's laws. The human being becomes capable of comprising and together-working subject, of God's words, and of the godlike life." (Stăniloae 1995: 160)

"Through prayer, the human being penetrates inside God as subject, and God penetrates within the human being as Subject. The prayer is the means, by excellence, which the human being experiences God through. The prayer elevates the human being above his own self, but without him ceasing to be a human being. The whole human being becomes through prayer an organ of perceiving God and of using His powers, of God as listening to the human being and as being Merciful to the human being, and not of a "god" submitted to the human being by the human being's power." (Stăniloae 1995: 160)

"In prayer, the human being addresses himself to God as The One Who is above any determination, and Who free master over all things, and Who isn't mastered by anything; the human being lives God as the loving Person-Absolute, namely as God actually is, but One listening to the prayer with benevolence, out of mercy and cherishing. And the human being lives on himself, in prayer, as a totally humble existence, dependent on - and only on - God, but an existence also loved by God and freed of all things and master in collaboration with God over all things. The human being often participates in prayer to the quality of the Absolute, by being freed from all the nature's laws. The human being has liberated himself of all worry for he has left it to the responsibility of the One Who can liberate him from all worries. In prayer, the human being lives with God above all worries. The human being lives with God with the sentiment that he is above all things, that he is imparted with Person-Absolute's level, but not out of his own power, but because of the benevolence of God and out of God's love. The human being, in such a state, he is stronger than all things but, in the same time, he is in a total humbleness because the strength he feels within himself it is the strength of the strong hand of God. "So, humble yourselves, under the strong hand of God, for He will elevate you on the right time. Let Him the whole your worry, for He takes care of you" (I Pt. 5: 6-7). The one who prays, he feels God listening to him with His attention as Person, as limitless source of power. The one who prays lives the most intimate encounter, as person, and the reciprocal interiority with God, trusting God that He will escape him from all his worries." (Stăniloae 1995: 160-161)

"Remembering others in one's prayer it is not excluded. But the one who prays doesn't feel himself as burdened with worries, but he feels himself as reassured by God that he will take the worries from those ones, and the worries from the one who prays too, but without this making the ones who prays as careless.” (Stăniloae 1995: 161)

“Saint Mark the Ascetic demanded us to bring our thoughts as sacrifices to Christ, from the first moment of their occurrence, until they aren’t mixed with something evil, until they aren’t bitten by beats, as he said.

Only thus we can preserve our thoughts clean, or we can fully unite ourselves with Christ. This is the importance of the man’s ministration as priest. Only thus the man can bring himself clean to Christ: if the man brings all his thoughts referring to the things, from the beginning, to Christ, in order the great Hierarch to bring those thoughts to the Father, and by this He sanctifies us. Only thus the things won’t become objects of our greediness, of some tendencies towards pleasure which occur within us.

In this manifests not only the true love for God, which sees God in all the things, but also the true love for things and persons, which doesn’t lower the things and the persons on the level of simple object of the man’s egotistic pleasures and interests, but which sees them in their wonderful and deep mystery and importance that is hidden in the eternal rationalities of the Word of God; only thus the man sees the persons as free partners of a love in full respect for each other and in an equal need for one another, and the things as means of manifesting the love amongst the human beings.” (Stăniloae 2006: 150)

Preaching

“The preaching of Jesus is also the calling addressed to the people, for them to receive this Kingdom as the unique chance they have for a true, eternal, and full life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 51)

Predestination

“It is something else with the ones who do not admit God by any means, and therefore neither in quality of cause. They are in a total ignorance and therefore in a wanted separation from Him. They no longer have, by will, anything from God, because they are closed to any communication with God. But God still is present within them, or united with them without their will, in His quality of creator and upholder cause of theirs. So, in a certain way, God knows also them, out of Himself, being united with them as cause of theirs. But in another way, God doesn’t know them, being separated from them by the fact that they are separated from him by their will.” (Stăniloae 2003: 244)

“By having the creatures in Himself and by knowing them infinitely more than we know them - in His quality of their cause – God doesn’t see all of them, though, like advancing towards their full union with Him, in accordance with their union with Him through their origin; and in this case, neither the creatures see God. God doesn’t know the creatures in the process of actualization of their potential image nor in the end of this process, in the total actualization of their union with God and of their beings. And neither the creatures know God during their earthly life, and nor in eternity, in the actualization of His love, because they haven’t made themselves capable of knowing Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 245)

“God has taken in account the freedom of the creatures in His prescience regarding them. He knows from before what they are going to do freely. He hasn’t wanted to predetermine them, in order to know them from before as predestined to the happiness or to the infelicity. He has taken in account also His freedom to do everything in order to help them in case they want to turn back to Him. His prescience has included the fact that anything He would do in the future, they will reject freely to come back to Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 248)

“The prescience of God regarding the ones who are going to go to the eternal damnation it consists only in the fact that he doesn’t see them in the final union with Him, a unity that is present to Him before taking place in a real mode. He sees these ones in the possibility there are initially given, to actualize through their will they unity they potentially have it by creation. He doesn’t see in Himself what those ones could have become if they had wanted to stay and to develop in Him. But He doesn’t see them actualized in a real mode, on the line of their virtuality, by remaining within Him. He sees them definitively separated from Him by their own will. He sees that His freedom from them couldn’t do anything to bring them back to him. In other words, anybody’s salvation depends on his own will too, once the will of God for everybody’s salvation is potentially involved in their nature, placed by God from the beginning (1 Tim. 2: 4).” (Stăniloae 2003: 248)

“Anybody who wants to remain in his initial union with God and to develop it, he can do this easily, just through the union he is initially gifted with, the union with God being potentially inscribed in anyone’s nature. Anybody who wants to be saved, he proves just by doing this that he isn’t predestined to the eternal damnation. Will go to damnation only the ones who do not really question themselves regarding to their will to be saved, and who never feel the torment of the question: am I destined to the eternal damnation? This is because, if they had ever felt this torment, just by this they would have proved that they would have wanted to be saved and they would have been saved.” (Stăniloae 2003: 249)

“God know from before, all these changes of our relationship with Himself, during our earthly life, to which will correspond to the changes of His attitude towards us. He knows from before that, through their freedom, some rational creatures will take back, once or for several times, their place in the frame of their rationality in Him and their development on this live.” (Stăniloae 2003: 250)

“The Holy Scripture admits only a predestination conditioned by the God’s foreknowing, or to the God’s calling, concerning the fact that some people collaborate with His grace and some don’t. “Who He has know from before, those ones he appointed too, to be in the image of His Son” (Rom. 8: 29). In the same manner must be understood also the places: Ephes. 1: 4-11, Phil. 2: 13; I Cor. 4: 7; and Rom. chapter 9.” (Stăniloae 2006: 130)

“A predestination only of some of the people it contradicts the love of God, manifested in the embodiment and in the Lord’s Cross, and the universal-ontological sense of assuming the human nature, as also the universal value of His Cross. A predestination only of some of the people, or of all of them, to salvation, it lowers the salvation on the level of a manipulation of the human being likened to some objects, no longer being a matter of communion between Christ as Person and the people as persons, communion which Christ cannot offer it arbitrarily only to some of them, and which the people would be forced to accept it. If God hadn’t offered the communion to everybody, it means that He would have reckoned some of the people as unworthy and incapable of communion by their own nature itself; and that God wouldn’t have reckoned the people as equals to one another by the valued itself He had given them with. This would mean a negation by God of His creation itself. Outside the communion with God, namely of the work of the Ghost within him, the man’s gifts cannot develop, so that these gifts would have been given to him purposelessly.” (Stăniloae 2006: 130)

Priesthood

“Through these thoughts and deeds through which we make ourselves, and Christ too, as masters over the whole being, over all our thoughts and deeds, though and deeds conceived and committed out of the power of Christ, we accomplish our priestly ministration. Through this ministration we offer Christ everything we think and do, and we offer Him ourselves too, by dying out of the power of His death and living to Him out of His power. Though this we develop our burial and our resurrection with Christ at Baptism.” (Stăniloae 2006: 148)

“By passionately looking at the things, by looking at the persons with enmity or passionately, it means laying down over them a fog, by granting them a too big momentary importance, which will become, in short time, despise, of which despise them from the first moment. The dispassionate look sees in the horizon of the infinite light of God and in their meanings of concretizing His endless wisdom and love and always varying towards us. That’s why the Holy Fathers demand us to look at the things in their simple meanings, or clean ones, separated from passion, by the fact that we bring them to God, we related them to God, fulfilling thus our job of priests of the creation in front of God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 150)

“The initiative of God - (of sacrificing His Own Son, t. n.) - it meets an aspiration of the man to sacrifice, and to sacrifice on himself, or to give, on himself, to God. The sanctification isn’t a work of God directed towards a passive object, but it answers an initiative of the human subject. This is the sense in which we spoke about a correlation between priesthood and the sanctifying work of God. Of course, this aspiration from the part of the man, it cannot be actualized without meeting a godlike initiative. At us, the people, due to the sin, neither the divine initiative can fully actualize the human aspiration, because it cannot make the human initiative, due to the sin, a full availability for God. God doesn’t make somebody a priest, like on an object, or against his will.” (Stăniloae 2006: 58)

“In the Old Testament, where the full communion between God and people still couldn’t be accomplished, the accent is less placed on the voluntary answer from the human creature. In the Old Testament the sacrifice was being brought by command, and it is significant the fact that in the Old Testament one speaks much about a sanctification of the animals before being sacrificed. Equally significant is the fact that the Old Testament doesn’t tell us about an answer of the ones who were to become priests, but only about an initiative of God Who consecrated all Aaron’s descendants as priests.” (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

““By becoming a sole stalk in the likeness of His death, we will be partakers to His resurrection too, by realizing that our former man has been crucified together with Christ, in order to destroy the body’s sin, so that we can no longer be slaves to the sin” (Rom. 6: 5-6). We must sanctify ourselves, out of the power of the sanctified body of Christ Who sits on the right hand of the glory and Whom we are imparted with, by fighting against our sinful passions, and by enduring the affects or the sufferings as consequences of the sin, but without committing any sin and “by presenting our bodies as a living, holy, well-pleasing to God sacrifice, and like a spiritual ministration of ours”, alike the body of Christ (Rom. 12: 1). This is our priesthood and sacrifice, out of the power and in the likeness of Christ’s priesthood and sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 2006: 62)

“The man doesn’t have, in the first place, the power to bring the world as sacrifice to God, in the man’s quality as priest, but the man has the power to bring, on himself, as sacrifice to God. In this sense, Saint Peter connects the “kingly priesthood” of the ones who believe in Christ, to their duty of heralding in their being “the virtues of the One Who called them from darkness to His lightened light” and “to restrain themselves from the bodily lusts which fight the soul” (I Pt. 2: 9-11). Only by becoming us too, as holy sacrifices, we enter at the Father, namely we enter the communion with the Father. In this is it shown the extension of Christ’s sanctified sacrifice within us, in order to make us too, but not without our collaboration, as sanctified sacrifices and, for Christ as sacrifice is in the same time priest, He makes us priests in tight union with Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 62)

“All the baptized people are priests and sacrifices within Church, all of them are teachers and guides towards salvation, to themselves and to other close to them believers, or even to other people, but without a formal responsibility for the churchly community. (...) The prayers the believers utter personally and the life of sacrifice they practice for themselves and in their relations with others, these prayers and sacrifice take their power out of the continuously bringing of Christ’s sacrifice and out of the impartation with it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“The sacrifice cannot be brought by any believer, because in such a case it wouldn’t be shown that this sacrifice is brought for “everybody”, but each believer would bring it for himself. The sacrifice must be brought by one for all; this one represents Christ Who, as One, He brings Himself sacrifice for all. This is the priest, servant of the Church, being responsible for a community. Through this the conscience of the believer is shown - in the same time – the fact that he needs Christ as Mediator. The priest symbolized

Christ as mediator; the priest symbolizes the fact that the man cannot enter, through himself, the relation of endless love with God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“The priestly, the teaching, and the imperial general ministration, with individual character, it needs the serving priesthood of the Church or of the community as its basis.” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“Like Christ hasn’t taken His priesthood from Himself, likewise, neither the persons appointed to this serving priesthood can take this priesthood from themselves, nor can the community give it to them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“Christ as Mediator, He mediates towards the Father, on the purpose of obtaining as man the forgiveness for people from God. As such, He hasn’t taken His priesthood from Himself, but He has been appointed to the job of Mediator by God-the Father: “Neither He gives to Himself this job from Himself, but only if he is called to it by God, likewise Aaron; likewise, Christ neither extolled, on Himself, by making, on Himself, Hierarch, but the One Who spoke to Him: “You are priest forever, according to the rule of Melchisedec” (Hebr. 5: 4-6).” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“Neither the one through whom is symbolized Christ, as priest specially chosen out of believers, he cannot give his priesthood to himself, from himself, for if this had been the case, every believer would have given the priesthood to himself, and it wouldn’t have been observed the truth that the priest is called by God, and it wouldn’t have been recognized the fact that through the priest is symbolized Christ, as differing from each believer and from all of them, as Mediator of them. That’s why the priest cannot receive his priesthood either from community, for the community is composed out of its members which aren’t priests. The community must recognize as whole too, or as Church, the fact that Christ, in His quality as Head of the Church, He is something else than the Church is as His body, that the Church itself needs Christ as Mediator Who differs from the Church and from the believers, and this fact must be made visible through the serving and mediator priest. Both the believers as individual persons and the community, they must refer to Christ as to the Mediator Who differs from them and from the Church, through the priests who aren’t appointed as priests by the community, but they are appointed by God - as God has done to Christ - as visible images of Christ, or as Christ’s organs.” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“The priesthood as activation in the sensitive plan of the unseen priesthood of Christ, or of Christ’s mediation towards God, it is a gift from God. The believers always need the visible priest, differing from them, for they always need Christ, as Mediator. The man doesn't steal his salvation from God, as in the case of making himself, on himself, priest. Neither the community can steal the salvation from God, in order to give the priesthood from itself. Like Christ has been sent as Mediator by His Father, likewise the priests and the bishops are sent by Christ, as being the ones through whom Christ fulfills His mediator or savior work. That's why the serving priests receive from Christ His Ghost, for Christ to commit through them His savior work. "Like the Father has sent Me I am sending you too... Take Holy Ghost; whom you will forgive his sins, his sins will be forgiven, and whom you will keep his sins, his sins will be kept" (Jn. 20: 23). Or: "I have chosen you and I have appointed you, for you to go and to bring fruits and your fruits to last" (Jn. 15: 16)." (Stăniloae 2006: 99-100)

"The Apostles, as witnesses of the resurrected Christ and as foundation stones the Church has been founded on, they do not have descendants. But as holders of the plenitude of the grace of the whole ministration within Church, they have the bishops as descendants, in an uninterrupted succession. (...) Christ transmitted to the Apostles "All the things He heard from the Father" (Jn. 15: 15)." (Stăniloae 2006: 100)

"Each bishop is the descendant of all the Apostles, for each Apostle was in communion with all the other Apostles. And then, each bishop is ordained by several bishops in the name of the whole episcopate, receiving the same grace and the same teaching all the Apostles and all the bishops had, and since this, they are able to share to the priests, and through them to the believers from his eparchy, the same grace and the same unchanged teaching, which are in the whole Church, or to put them in communion with the Same Christ, Who, by bringing Himself, as sacrifice to the Father, in continuation, he has His humanity in connection of the endless love with the Father." (Stăniloae 2006: 100)

"The uninterrupted succession of the grace to the Apostles, it doesn't mean that the river of the grace or of the endless love of Christ it only comes from the past, out of the persons who mediated it, horizontally, through a string of intermediaries. If Christ Himself is the one Who works through any committer of the Mysteries, or if Christ Himself communicates His love for the Father and for the ones who received the Mysteries - through the Mysteries' committer - than Christ Himself will work in the bishops who will ordain again, for He is in heavens and within Church, communicating this love of His. On each time the grace comes from above too. The succession only means that the Same Christ Who worked starting with the Apostles and to the bishops from today, He still works through the mediation of the bishops who ordain, also upon the newly ordained one, and He will work through the Mysteries the newly ordained bishop will officiate as bishop. Christ is a direct presence for the new bishop, but the He is the Same Who was a direct presence to the bishops from all the past too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 100)

“Christ appoints - directly, in an invisible mode, and indirectly, through the other bishops – the bishops, the priests, and the deacons from any time, by communicating them the Holy Ghost or the endless love for God, and of God Who is in His body. But Christ communicated His love through the prayers of the first Apostles, then of the bishops (bishops: I Tim. 1: 6; Tit. 1: 5; priests: I Tim. 5: 22; I Tit 5: 1; Acts 14: 22; 20, 28; deacons: Acts 6: 6; I Tim. 3: 10 etc.). The mediation of religious service officiated by the bishops and by the priest, it always involves a dimension of the past too, for it implies the continuity of the Same Christ, but also the living reality of the ones who transmit us the grace of the Christ’s love, through their faith. The believer - in whom Christ is now working, through the mediation of a priest - he receives Christ through the mediation of a priest; the respective priest has received the grace, in the past, through his faith, through a believer bishop. The believer receives the grace through the mediation of a priest, who has received the grace from Christ for he has believed in Christ and he has received the grace from a bishop who has believed, at his turn, in Christ. The time with its succession, it is included in the fact itself that the grace is received through a person who already believes and who prays. The grace comes through the mediation of some persons who transmit to us, in the same time with the grace, also their faith through the Holy Ghost. Thus, in the same time with the succession of the grace from Apostles we have the succession, from them, of the faith too. The priesthood as objective mediator of Christ Who has made and who remains Himself objective Mediator, it includes the present actuality of the Christ’s work, but of the Same Christ Who worked in the whole Church’s past.” (Stăniloae 2006: 100-101)

“The serving priesthood, which makes present to us, in a certain place and in a certain time, the sacrifice of Christ, in order to be us imparted with it, it means that Christ is, in continuation, as Hierarchy, identical to His sacrifice. The willing sacrifice of Christ it cannot be separated from Christ Himself, as Hierarchy, or as objective Mediator.” (Stăniloae 2006: 101)

“Through his serving priesthood, the priest isn’t spared, as individual person, from the necessity of the prayers for himself, like all the believers the sacrifice of Christ for community, and by tying to is the prayers for the believers, the priest includes himself too amongst the believers, and he take, at proskomidy, a piece for himself too. In addition to that, the priest also asks other priests for praying for him when celebrating the Eucharist. In his serving priesthood he includes also his individual sacrifice and prayer, and in this it is shown his unity with the other ministrants. And if he doesn’t accomplish his priesthood with worthiness, or if he doesn’t pray and bring his sacrifice for himself, he will put his personal salvation at risk.” (Stăniloae 2006: 101)

“If the priest keeps in unity a liturgical community, by gathering all its members, with their prayers, around the Lord’s sacrifice, the bishop maintains the unity amongst the priests of a Local church, representing Christ to a wider community and maintaining by this, in unity, the Church from a certain territory. By representing Christ in that wider unity of the Church, the bishop ordains the priests from that territory. Then, through the communion of each bishop with all the other bishops, started through the ordination of a bishop by several other bishops, as representatives of the entire Church, it is maintained the unity of the entire Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 101)

“The bishops remain too, as human persons, framed in the community, the body of Christ, being saved in the frame of the Christ’s body. The communion’s law is valid for them too. That’s why the relation between the bishop and the serving priest and the community it cannot be reduce to only one formula. The bishop is both mediator of Christ and member of the Church as body of Christ. No bishop singularizes himself; no bishop becomes exclusive seen substitute of the unique Head, Christ. That’s why Christ has left the leadership of the Church to the communion of the Apostles, and not exclusively to Peter and to his descendants. By this, the episcopate is framed not only in the community of the Church, but also in the communion of the episcopate, between these two being a tight connection. Each member of the Church, even being a bishop, he is saved in the dependency on Christ and in the community of the Church, for the same Christ is in all the Church’s members, uniting them as a body of His in the infinity of His love for the Father and of the Father for Him. That’s why a bishop is ordained by several bishops, as representatives of the entire episcopate, and through this, by Christ in His quality as Head of the entire Church, to which Church Christ mediates its work through the entire episcopate, through all the priests in communion with the bishops.” (Stăniloae 2006: 101)

“The relation the priest and the bishop have with Christ cannot be reduced to a simple formula, either from another point of view. The one who officiates through them, the Eucharist, is Christ Himself. Christ is in the Liturgy too, not only the sacrifice but also the One Who sacrifices. As such, Christ is not sacrificed, properly-said, by the bishop or by the priest, but Christ sacrifices Himself. “He crumbles Himself and He doesn’t separate Himself”, he gives Himself away to the ones who are imparted “through His almighty hand”. The transformation of the gifts in the body and in the blood of Christ is committed through the Ghost of Christ, but the Ghost is sent by Christ and together with the Ghost Christ is present too. Although, for the building up of the believers' souls, it is suitable that the bishops and the priests to have an exemplary spiritual life, namely to bring themselves as sacrifice, together with Christ, for Christ bring Himself as sacrifice and Christ gives Himself away through the priest and through the bishop His body and blood to the entire churchly community, Christ's bringing and His giving into Mysteries he doesn't make it dependent on the worthiness of the bishop and of the priest, because their unworthiness isn't Christ's unworthiness and it isn't Church's unworthiness as body of Christ, Who is in the relation of the endless love with God. (...) Christ places Himself in direct connection with the believer people, or He is in a connection He intensifies, even through the acts of the unworthy servants. It is curious that, just the ones who would be more independent from the Church's servants in their relation with Christ, they are offended more by their unworthiness, so that they give the mediation a more important role than it actually has. The mediation must be regarded rather as occasioning, as transparent mediation, than as personal impropriation, by the servant, of the gift from Christ and as transmitting it, in this way, to the believers." (Stăniloae 2006: 102)

"The mediation done by the priest it isn't identical to a substituting of Christ; the priest hasn't become another Christ. The power of Christ works through the priest, or better said, through the act committed by the priest, and act which isn't, properly-said, his act, but it is the act of the Church, without becoming the power of the priest. But the power of Christ neither comes through the priest as through passive channel, but the priest must pray, he must participate to what happens, by praying for others. And for the definition of the priest defines him as bringing prayer for the people to God, Saint Gregory of Nazianzus said that the priest is "together-servant with Christ". The prayer shows the man again like praying for others, like Christ, but having the efficacy of his mediation out of Christ's mediation." (Stăniloae 2006: 102)

"Why has God chosen a certain person for, through that person's prayers, to occasion the descent of the Ghost? This is for God has had to choose one in order the objective ministration of Christ as Mediator, to be made obvious. But God could choose anybody, on the condition that that one is a believer and prepares himself for this ministration." (Stăniloae 2006: 102)

"The priest, though through his prayers he occasions the work of Christ, he remains human, who needs too salvation; he remains so much a man that he prays more than others, being aware of the fact that the savior work done by grace it doesn't belong to him, but it belongs to the Ghost of Christ. Being aware of the fact that through his human fewness, by officiating so great Mysteries, there is Christ Himself working, the priest far from being proud, he commits his prayers and sensitive acts through which Christ commits

His savior work in an unseen manner, with a more shaking fear than that of any other believer.” (Stăniloae 2006: 102)

“The same twofold conscience of the godlike power that Christ Himself exercises through him, and the conscience of his human unworthiness, it is lived by the priest also when officiating the Mystery of the Repentance, in which the supra-human power of forgiving the sins is being exercised through him, but without being his power. (...) Only by emptying himself, through humbleness, of all the pride, the priest receives with sensitiveness the entering of the godlike power in him and through him he passes the same sensitiveness to others, and so the priest or the bishop becomes inwardly too, a mediator of the grace of Christ, living in a communion with the ones who receive this grace – namely the endless love of Christ Who wants to unite everybody with Himself and with one another. If the priest doesn’t live with extreme humbleness the shiver of the godlike act which is being committed through him, he remains somehow outside this community of the other with Christ, namely outside the community of the believers who receive Christ through that priest. Thus, the believers benefit more of his priesthood, than the priest himself does.” (Stăniloae 2006: 102)

“The fact that the power of Christ is exercised through the priest independently from the priest’s worthiness, it doesn’t mean that the priest must arbitrarily use the power exercise through him even if he is unworthy. The priest must strive himself to identify his judgment and attitude towards the believers to the one of Christ, and not to consider he can identify Christ’s judgment and attitude to his ones. In this sense, Christ Himself is the One Who utters His judgment through the priest. The human subjectivity must be identified to the Christ’s objectivity in the Mystery of the Repentance and with the gentleness and the humbleness of Christ. The human subjectivity must fully conform itself to the judgment and to the attitude of Christ, or better said to deepen itself in Christ’s love for people, or to become the organ of that love, always aware of the fact that it isn’t itself this ocean of love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 102-103)

“The priest must try to conform himself as fully as possible, to the reality of the Christ’s love, through an especially accentuated responsibility he feels as servant towards everybody’s loving Master Who has shown us the ways He wants to save us through. This responsibility highlights again the subordinate state of the human priesthood, and also our dependence on Christ the Mediator. This is for Christ the Mediator is animated by the supreme responsibility for the souls, before the heavenly Father, and out of this responsibility is nourished the responsibility too of the seen priest of the Church, given the fact that the priest is responsible for the fulfilling of the responsibility of Christ towards the Father for the believers, and through this fulfilling the priest highlights even more the Christ’s quality as Mediator towards the Father, and towards us, but also his quality as servant of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 103)

“The Holy Fathers tightly connect the teaching ministration and the pastoral-guiding ministration, to the priestly – officiating the Mysteries – ministration. The laymen can give teachings and urges from person to person, but the responsibility for the enlightenment of the entire community, in what regards the entire teaching of Christ, it falls to the bishops and to the priests. Through teaching the mysterious body of Christ is being defended against the foreign contestations.” (Stăniloae 2006: 103)

“The teaching the priest and the bishop must give is that through which they lead the people to God, to the clean and loving connection with Him. In order to do that, it is required a great knowledge concerning the man and a great love for the human being. The whole teaching the priest or the bishop gives to the people, it must refer to the man’s relation with God, or of God with the man, trying to intensify this relation, to prepare the man for it, by helping him to purify himself of passions, of egotism, of everything that limits him and lock him up into himself and within this world. This is a theandric teaching which saves, which assures to the man the eternity in relation with the not-passing God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 103)

“Leading the soul towards salvation it is always a ministration; it has a spiritual character, for it is from the Holy Ghost, together with the priesthood grace. It doesn’t pursuit anything else but the believers’ salvation, as all the other ministrations of the priesthood do, or to place the believers in relation of endless love with Christ and with one another. It is guided according to the example of the Savior, Who hasn’t come to be served, but to give His soul as sacrifice for many (Mt. 20: 25-28).” (Stăniloae 2006: 104)

“The priesthood with its three hierarchical levels, it is so necessary to the Church than, without them, “it cannot be called Church”. Actually, without the threefold ministration of Christ, continued through visible organs, there is not Church. And this continuous ministration nourished the Church and keeps the Church unitary and alive by the fact that Christ Himself remains within Church and He imposes Himself to the Church’s conscience as Mediator, and therefore as the One Who has to have in the Church’s servant His seen image as Mediator. (...) through the hierarchy’s members as objective mediators of ours, it is activated in a visible manner the objective ministration of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 104)

“The Son of God has taken our body and he has made Himself as one of us, by showing that we cannot achieve the salvation by ourselves, through subjective states which can deceive us. This undeceiving objective mediation is activated by Christ through the objective visible mediation of some persons for not to make our salvation depending on unsure subjective sentiments. Thus, the priesthood is a confirmation of the real embodiment of God as our objective Mediator to God. If Christ has made Himself a visible man in order to show us that he is both on our side and on the side of God, why wouldn't He use visible organs from amongst us? But these visible organs mediate, though, from Christ, the power that isn't from people, as Christ, as man, mediated for us the godlike power, which wasn't from His humanity. If the priesthood is the confirmation of the real embodiment of the Son of God, as man, denying the priesthood will question the importance of the Lord's embodiment. This is the reason why some Protestant religious schools ended, very often to deny Christ as embodied God." (Stăniloae 2006: 104-105)

"Denying the priesthood comprises in it also questions the fact that the salvation comprises in its range our bodied too, a fact that stays too in relation with the weakening of the faith in the embodiment of the Word of God. Through the embodiment of the Word of God and through priesthood, God takes in account the fact that we are bodies too, and we won't be saved as true humans if the Son of God hasn't worked upon His body too, and if He doesn't work upon our bodies too. But the works started out of His body they cannot be exercised upon our body except through the mediation of some sensitive acts, committed by seen persons – or priests, as images of the Mediator Christ, these seen priests being dressed up in bodies, since the body of Christ, through spiritualization, it is no longer on the visible plan." (Stăniloae 2006: 105)

"Denying the priesthood, it means denying the Church as objective ambience of the salvation, in which we must frame ourselves with our subjective feeling, and on which is founded the real value of our subjective feelings. Our communion in Christ cannot be unseen in our visible manifestations too, so that the grace of Christ, or His endless love for us, which wants to gather all of us in this love for Him and for one another, it is impossible not to be manifested also in our visible manifestations, therefore within the Church, as communion amongst ourselves. This is why denying the priesthood, done by some Christians confessions, drove to the weakening of the seen Church in favor of an unseen Church and to contesting any efficiency of the salvation of Christ upon our bodies, fact that has its premise again in the weakening of the faith in the embodiment of the Son of God, or in the weakening of the connection between the Son of God and the human nature, which, some of the contestants still pretend Christ has assumed it." (Stăniloae 2006: 105)

"The succession of the grace is conditioned by the continuity of the teaching, but the grace received by bishops through apostolic succession ensures the preservation of the apostolic teaching. This is for this grace isn't being transmitted without the apostolic teaching, for it is not transmitted in a vacuum. The bishop assures the bishops who are ordaining him – and through them the entire episcopate and the Church –, before he receives the hierarchical grace, that he has impropriated the apostolic faith and teaching, so that he is worthy of receiving the mission he is entrusted with, of maintaining and preaching the apostolic teaching. In addition to that, it is necessary that the grace of Christ, conveyed through the Holy Ghost and used in the synodal assembly, for correctly interpreting the teaching, for preaching and solidary preserving the teaching out of the Apostolic tradition, in the spirit of which it must be interpreted the written apostolic teaching too." (Stăniloae 2006: 124)

"Christ Who is in the priests and in the believers, he is also above them - He is within Church and He is also above Church. Likewise, we receive Him too, both from heavens and from them. They occasion us through their faith and through their knowledge the receiving of Christ out of them, but also out of heavens as the ultimate height Christ is in. The priests and the bishops who celebrate the Mysteries, they preach and give knowledge about Christ Who is within Church and above Church. Their prayer that occasions the Christ's coming within us, they make is within Church, and that's why the Church prays within them." (Stăniloae 2006: 124)

"The priest is the seen organ through whom the Christ from within Church works in an unseen mode in Mysteries, or He grants the grace to the ones the Mysteries are administrated to." (Stăniloae 1997: 18)

"The priest's gestures touch the whole receiver's being and they don't penetrate him only through his hearing. Besides that, there are many words and they can be repeated for many times without being able to create a special situation of outmost solemnity and by this it is difficult that one word to gain to the receiver the decisive and unique importance had by a gesture, or had by a compound of gestures which aren't repeated and which touch more directly the receiver's body. Then, these gestures aren't gestures the man has chosen at that moment, but they are gestures common to the Church which Christ is working within. The Mystery not only urges the man, by words, to impropriate the death and the resurrection with Christ, but it determines the man to somehow imitate them and, partially, to accomplish by some gestures the death with Christ for the old life, and the resurrection with Christ to another life, given the fact that the Mystery isn't only word but it is also a compound of acts established and unique throughout the whole Church, in the basis of Christ's commandment. Through prayers, gesture, and declarations, the Mystery doesn't only express but it also accomplishes somehow what it expresses by words." (Stăniloae 1997: 18)

“As such, The Mystery is a decisive and unique event in that man’s life who comes to faith and who continues to believe - as the simple words cannot be. The sacramental gestures of the priest and of the bishop, committed in the name of the Church and with the Church’s authority, namely with the authority of Christ Who works within Church, those sacramental gestures really fulfill the intended work, for Christ Himself is fulfilling it in an unseen manner and the Church itself is fulfilling that work through seen gestures.” (Stăniloae 1997: 18-19)

“The priest present in front of the believer the empowerment he has from Christ and from the Church, in his quality as their representative, in a mode corresponding to the report between Christ and the Church: that one of Christ, Who has designated him as seen organ whose gestures and declarations Christ Himself commits the Mystery through, in an unseen manner; of the Church, for the priest does the invocation of the Holy Ghost, consequently to which the Ghost of Christ descends with His work, through the priest’s matters, the gestures, the prayers, and declarations, within the one who receives the Mystery.” (Stăniloae 1997: 19)

“This double and though indivisible representative quality the priest and the bishop have, it is proven by their ordination itself. This is for the ordination is officiated in a seen manner by a bishop, or in the case of the bishop it is officiated by several bishops, but in unseen manner there is Christ ordaining them, namely to a person the quality of priest or of bishop, who are seen committers of the Mysteries, or He empowers that person with His grace for the job as His seen organ in committing the Mysteries. But the bishop or the bishops who are committing the ordination, they invoke as well, in the Mystery of the Ordination, the Holy Ghost in the name of the Church, and even a community of the Church accompanies the bishop or the bishops in the prayers they raise while committing the ordination. This community of the Church accompanies the priest and the bishop also while committing the other Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 19)

“The Church’s teaching that the validity of the Mysteries officiated by the priest or by a bishop do not depend on their worthiness, it is based on the fact that the prayer and the invocation of the Holy Ghost done by them, they are the prayers and the invocation belonging to the Church, and their sacramental gestures and their declaration about the grace that descends, they are accompanied by the Church’s faith that Christ Himself works through them in an unseen manner and that Christ Himself fulfills each time His promise He has given when He instituted the Mysteries, that when the Mysteries are officiated He will descend upon the ones who receive the Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 19)

“Of course, it is recommendable the priest or the bishop to manifest, at their turn, a personal worthiness in their priestly or hierarchal ministration. But if this worthiness lacks, its absence will be replaced by the Church’s faith and worthiness. Karl Rahner says that if some priests aren’t worthy, their lack of worthiness will be replaced by other’s worthiness. And if all the priests and the bishops had been unworthy, the general unworthiness couldn’t have been covered by anything. In such a case, the holiness of the Church’s members had no longer depended on a serving hierarchy, and this hierarchy wouldn’t have subsisted actually. This case I analogue to the sinfulness of the Church’s members. If some of them are sinners, the Church will remain holy through other members who aren’t sinners; but if all the members had been sinners, the Church would have ceased to be holy, because the Church is composed by the people who believe in Christ and within whom the Christ is dwelling by this. But it is more correctly to say that the worthiness itself of some of the believers, as worthiness of the Church, it replaces the unworthiness of the priests. And such believers aren’t going to lack ever.” (Stăniloae 1997: 19)

“Like we must recognize Christ’s authority for choosing some matters and for establishing some gestures in order the Mysteries to be officiated, we must recognize His authority of choosing some people as well, as visible organs who to officiate the Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 19-20)

“Choosing and empowering with these organs, as persons with a special grace, it signifies also the fact that any Mystery mean entering the communion with Christ as Person, that it by and large is a Mystery of founding the communion with Christ, and of the communion with the other members who are united with Christ, and each person from the Church’s community it fulfills the role of a ring in the chain of the communion with Christ Who has become man, and with the other people who believe in Christ. Christ gives Himself to us, as a gift, through Mysteries, in order to create higher forms and degrees of communion with Him and amongst ourselves. As such, the man must live the fact that in the moment of the Mystery he enters the communion with Christ, Who is a supreme You, and Who elevates the man on the level of the communion with Himself, but Who is in the same time a man descended on the level of the communion with us, through another man. The believer is occasioned this living of entering the communion with Christ, necessarily, by another person and, in the most adequate mode, by the person who has a permanent empowerment from Christ and from the Church, in order to mediate that communion with Christ, in order to uphold and to promote the communion of the believers with Christ and amongst themselves. This mission of him it is objectively made known as he has it from Christ and from the Church, and not as being a simple subjective presumption, a pretention of a person who will give himself such an empowerment. Only the Church, as body of Christ, can give such an objective guarantee, or only through the Church somebody can receive this empowerment from Christ, as a visible organ having the quality of committing the Mysteries, as occasion of committing Himself the Mysteries. Only thus Christ uses, objectively, the Mysteries as means of gathering the believers in Him, for He gathers them in a visible unity, around some persons who represent this visible unity as well.” (Stăniloae 1997: 20)

“The believer has, in his relation with the priest, on one hand a human visible you as central intermediary of the communion with the community of the ones who believe in Christ, and on the other hand he has a you who occasions him the living of the relation with Christ as godlike and human Person in the same time – supreme and close to the maximum Person –, a Person the priest himself indicates, for the priest is from amongst the people and having in the same time the mission from above, for he is sent for it – the priest has, as well, the concrete warmth of the man, but also the responsibility of bringing Christ close to his fellow human, or in connection with him. The priest makes Christ the more transparent, as his responsibility towards Christ makes him surrender himself increasingly more to Him in this mission, and as the more the priest humbles himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 20)

“By choosing a person and by sending that person with the empowerment from Him given through the Church, for officiating the Mysteries, Christ communicates His word and the word about Himself as well, which is preserved unchanged within the entire Church, as means for unity. By this word, which constitutes the content of the Church’s prayers, the believers are being explained just the meaning of the Mysteries and the duties they have in order to use the Mysteries’ power in order to imprint in themselves in an actual mode the image of Christ. The priest and the bishop chosen thus, by Christ, they receive also the empowerment of pastorally guiding the believers towards salvation. (Stăniloae 1997: 20-21)

“The unworthiness of the priest or of the bishop who celebrates the Mysteries mustn’t determine him to be careless in accomplishing his ministration. He won’t remain unpunished for his unworthiness. God takes care for certain margins not to be exceeded by the priest or by the bishop, in their unworthiness, through His speech in the conscience of the priest and of the bishop. By doing so, God keeps the Church tied to Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 39)

“By being the Christians anointed like Christ, or by participating to His anointment, they are priests too. But the priest is firstly cleaned up, to his mind and to his hands, namely to the source of the thoughts and to the organs of fulfilling those thoughts, and then he is given the power of the Ghost in order to be able to work cleanly with his mind and with his hands, by bringing sacrifices of good thoughts and deeds, in favor of the Church and of his fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 1997: 45)

“On the general priesthood the believers receive through the Mystery of the Anointing with Chrism, Saint Makarios the Egyptian said: The people sanctified through Anointing they become Christians in order to be: emperors, priests, and prophets of the heavenly Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 45)

“The seen committer of the Eucharist is the priest or the bishop as organ of Christ and as representative of the Church. The believers live in this the fact that Christ Who brings Himself sacrifice for them He is distinct from them; as such, Christ uses a person who is distinct from them and who is appointed by Christ Himself through a special sanctification, as organ of the seen committing of the Mysteries. The priest is sanctified through a special sanctification, as Christ has been sanctified, as man by the Father through the Ghost, and in order to be brought as sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 1997: 78)

“For the priest and the bishop are sanctified by God within Church and for the Church, they are appointed to commit the Mysteries within Church and for the Church. This is for Christ Who is in heavens is the same within the Church too, the Church being His mysterious body; Christ from heavens isn’t another Christ than the one from within Church. And the priest is endorsed by the Church. The priest utters the Church’s prayers, the community accompanies the priest; the priest brings forth the Christ’s sacrifice, as sacrifice for the Church and, in another sense, as sacrifice of the Church. The bishop and the priest they haven’t taken their quality from themselves and therefore they do not bring Christ as sacrifice from themselves, but Christ has to indicate and to sanctify distinct persons on this purpose. This is especially for Christ brings Himself as sacrifice not for one but for everybody, for the entire community, or for the local Church. That’s why somebody cannot make himself, bringer of the sacrifice of Christ for the whole community.” (Stăniloae 1997: 78)

“The believers must live the fact that neither their sacrifices as persons, representing their life as sacrifice, they do not present these sacrifices by themselves, but through Christ, and this it is shown in the fact that Christ appoints the person through whom He commits visibly the act of receiving the believers sacrifices and prayers in order to present these sacrifices and prayer to the Father. Thus, Christ’s report with the believers it is subtilized in a collective feeling, in which it is very difficult to distinguish His objective reality, namely in an illusion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 78)

“The Law of the New Testament fulfills the Law of the Old Testament. For, as there were necessary objective sacrifices brought through priests, here we must bring the objective sacrifice of Christ through the priest as seen organ of Him. The difference is that the sacrifices brought in the Old Testament weren’t sufficient in order to bring the savior grace, namely they didn’t give the believers the power to sacrifice themselves together with Christ, because Christ didn’t show Himself. Only in the New Testament the objective sacrifice of Christ, brought in continuation and extended within us, it has the power of transforming us, of the ones who believe. Through the priesthood from then wasn’t working Christ, through the priesthood from now Christ is working upon the ones who believe.” (Stăniloae 1997: 81)

“The sanctification and the ordination of the priests it is even the act through which Christ, in a seen manner, he chooses them and He invests them as organs through whom, when they commit the sacramental acts, He commits those acts Himself in an unseen manner; and when they teach and shepherd in His name, He teaches and shepherd Himself through them. But this sanctification not only makes them worthy to do these, but it also obliges them to do these. This means that Christ invests them with a “charisma” or with a “gift”, in order they to commit with seriousness, with responsibility, as like a duty, these works, for, what they commit to be committed by Christ through them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 100)

“The priests aren’t only seen and self-standing images of Christ as Priest, but they also are seen organs of His unseen Priesthood. The teaching the priests communicate isn’t of theirs, and through their hand aren’t communicated the blessings and the charismas of theirs, but of Christ. Therefore, they have no reasons for getting haughty. But their hand and mouth do not move without their will, but with their will to make them servants to Christ. The priests aren’t passive instruments of Christ. Therefore, they are worthy of honor. But the more they make themselves available to the work of Christ through them, the greater is the honor they are worthy of. In their maximum zeal is shown their humbleness, and vice versa - namely, they are aware of the fact that the power doesn’t belong to themselves but to Christ. That’s why, if Christ as Hierarch He is Ministrant, all the more the priests will be the ministrants of His savior ministration. The priests do not give from themselves anything except the ministration. If they do not give their ministration whole heartedly, not only they won’t fulfill the Christ’s savior work as they should, but they will mostly impede its accomplishing.” (Stăniloae 1997: 101)

“Christ exercises His work as unique and unifier Priest not only by the fact that His Priesthood is exercised in each community by a unique organ, but also through the fact that these organs too are brought to unity, in a unique and seen center of theirs: this is the bishop.” (Stăniloae 1997: 101)

“The bishop is the full representative of Christ Who is the unique and unifier Hierarch. Each bishop is the head of a local Church, “the head of the fullness of Christ”. This is for Christ invests the bishop not only with the charisma and with the responsibility of committing the Mysteries, which are committed by the priest as well, but also with that of committing the Mystery of the Ordination, for all the priests to have their priesthood through him, and they to obey him. Whether Christ makes, through sanctification, the priest to be His organ and seen image of His in committing the other Mysteries, He makes the bishops His organ and seen image also in the sanctification of the seen organs which all the other Mysteries are committed through.” (Stăniloae 1997: 101)

“The bishops still remain in the category of the ministrant. The power exercised through him isn’t his, but it belongs to Christ. The bishops must be overwhelmed, more than any other man, by the fact that still being a mortal man as anybody else, or maybe weaker than many others, through him it is done the fullest savior work of Christ. He must be overwhelmed by the responsibility he bears on his shoulders, for the Church; but, in the same time, being ware of the fact that, the more he restrains his pride of reckoning that the Church depends on him, the more he fulfills his responsibility and the more he puts himself at Christ’s disposition. His aspiration must tend towards humbly identifying as completely as possible, his will to the will of Christ, instead of taking Christ in the service of his pretention of reigning. The more the bishop contributes to making Christ more seen and more praised the more efficient will he be in his work.” (Stăniloae 1997: 102)

“The bishops are kept humble also through the fact that no one is self-standing, or master of everyone, but each one is framed within the community of all the bishops, in order together to preserve the teaching of Christ and the liturgical and unitary canonical rule of the Church, the sole which Christ works through, and therefore the sole which the salvation of the people is being accomplished through. They must obey Christ, but Christ is within Church and He established to work Himself through Mysteries, to make Himself known as The Same, through the teaching which the Church preserves it unaltered, or which the bishops preserve it together and with the whole Church. The bishops meet in the One Christ through the communion amongst them, but also in their humble connection with the whole Church, the body of Christ, avoiding making out of their communion a form of separate body defending some worldly privileges of theirs. Like the primate of a sole person is wrong, likewise it is wrong the primate of a small group, understood in the same spirit.” (Stăniloae 1997: 102)

“The episcopal community having a more accentuated manifestation in the episcopal synods of the local Churches, and in the communion amongst these Churches, and – in exceptional cases – in the ecumenical Synod, it inherits the ghost of the apostolic communion, which reciprocally completes with humbleness. This is for the task of understanding Christ and His righteous preaching, and the task of guiding the people of God towards salvation, it is so difficult that one bishop doesn't dare to accomplish it without consulting the other bishops too." (Stăniloae 1997: 102-103)

"The unity represented by the priest – as center of the parish, and by the bishop – as center of the eparchy, it doesn't become singularity, but it is framed within the communion of the whole Church, as the apostles have been framed, through the communion amongst them and through their great responsibility for the Church, in the Same Christ, the sole truly efficient unique center in what concerns the salvation, Who is not alone at His turn, but He is in Trinity." (Stăniloae 1997: 103)

"The initial basis of the Church's unity is Christ, the Hierarch by excellence, sanctified by God-the Father through the Holy Ghost, without mediation, and Christ will remain forever and ever at the basis of the Church. But His seen organs united amongst them are His – the unique Hierarch, by excellence. He has chosen the twelve disciples, who are His envoys or apostles, like he is the Envoy or the Apostle of the Father (Hebr. 3: 1)." (Stăniloae 1997: 103)

"Through apostles, Christ gives His Church a seen wider basis for the time He is going to pass on the unseen plan. This basis is wider for the Church that, at its turn, it will be extended from the group of the ones who believed in Christ at the beginning and who prefigured the Church. But this basis still remains unitary, through the apostles' communion in Christ, Who has remained with them. In order the seen Church's unity not to find its ultimate center in the seen plan, but in Christ, Christ has left not a sole apostle and his descendants as Church's center, but he has left a community of apostles and of bishops, for they to be aware of the fact that their ultimate unity and the unity of the Church it is in Christ, that He is the unique Hierarch, and that He is in Trinity. All the bishops must surpass themselves in a superior to them unity, in Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 103-104)

"Through His sending, and then through choosing and sanctifying the twelve apostles on Pentecost, it has been instituted the Mystery of the Ordination. But the content of the mission of the chosen thus and ordained and of their descendants, it is indicated by the Savior on all occasions when he commands them and gives them the power to baptize, to forgive the sins, to officiate the Eucharist, to tell in plain light what they have heard, whispered to their ear, about Him (Mt. 10: 27) and what they have seen at Him, and to urge people to observe as many as he has commanded (Mt. 28: 20). Even in defining given by Christ to the diverse powers and works of the apostles and of their descendants, we have the proof of their instituting as bishops and priests. In the Gospel according to John (20: 22), Jesus conveys to the apostles and to their descendants the episcopal and priestly power of forgiving the sins, by the breath of the Holy Ghost, power which is the earnest of the Ordination, which they will be given completely with on Pentecost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 104)

“For Christ gave His teaching all the time He was with them, and His deeds took place also while he was with his disciples, one can say that Christ, through all His teaching and activity, He indicated the content of the mission of His seen organs, in continuation. And for He sent them to teaching and to committing the Mysteries, he assured them that He will be with them until the end of time (Mt. 28: 19) and that: “Who receives you, he receives Me” (Mt. 10: 41), and: “Not you are speaking, but the Ghost of your Father is speaking within you” (Mt. 10: 20), so that He showed by these that the disciples are the subjects through who Himself, as Source-Subject, He further communicates His teaching and His charismas in Mysteries: Himself is the Hierarchy, the Teacher, and the Shepherd in them. Through the whole His savior teaching and activity, which He entrusted the apostles and their descendants with, towards seen teaching and continuation, Christ has given a content to the ministration the apostles and their descendants have been called to.” (Stăniloae 1997: 104)

“By following the example and by observing the commandment of the Savior, and on the basis of His assuring that He will be until the end of time with the ones who teach, who baptize, and who advise, the Apostles conveyed to their descendants the mission which they were given by the Savior. They did this through prayers and by laying their hands upon the ones who were called to the worthiness of being the apostles’ descendants (Acts 14: 23; II Tim. 1: 6). At the beginning, appointing priests and bishops was given to all the ones whom the apostles ordained as their descendants (Acts 20: 17-28). It was possible that, as long as the Christian communities were small and far between, as communities founded especially in cities, these descendants were, in most of the cases Bishops, including their quality as priests too. But after quite a short time after the community grew up in number and extended to the villages as well, these bishops appeared as endowed with the power of ordaining new priests as their helpers (Tit 1: 5) and of supervising the priests’ activity (I Tim. 5: 19).” (Stăniloae 1997: 104)

“In addition to the bishops and priests whom the apostles appointed, they appointed also the first deacons by as well laying their hands upon them (Acts 6: 6). The deacon’s rank has continued ever since (I Tim. 3: 12).” (Stăniloae 1997: 105)

“Following the apostolic tradition, the Orthodox Church has preserved until today the three ranks of the hierarchy within Church, each of these ranks having a special grace. In order one to obtain the grace of a higher rank he needs to obtain previously the grace of the inferior ranks. The other ranks beside the three mentioned ranks, they aren’t of divine right so that they haven’t a special grace. Even though such ranks are granted in the frame of a religious service, they aren’t ordination, and therefore they only have administrative significations.” (Stăniloae 1997: 105)

“In committing the Mysteries, the presbyter-priest prays in the name of the believers and on their behalf, he brings the bloodless sacrifice. But he sanctified the honored gifts and he commits all the Mysteries and he works everything, in the name of Christ (in persona Christi) and with mandate from Christ Whose servant and representative he is, though unworthy. For Christ, as the true and the unique Shepherd, he chooses the priests as His organs towards committing the Mysteries, by conveying the priests the gifts and the power from the Father, in order they to become priests and teachers and shepherds and to exercise these three ministrations of His, the priests receive the priestly gift and power from Christ, and not from believers; this is for the believers cannot grant the priest a power which they do not have.” (Stăniloae 1997: 105-106)

“The Christians are in this sense an “imperial priesthood” (I Pt. 2: 9). But the Christian’s sacrifices, or the Christians themselves as sacrifices, they must be added to the sacrifice of Christ. This is for only through Christ as sacrifice the Christian can at their turn to enter as sacrifice at the Father. There is needed their initiative in sacrificing, because if they had been brought as sacrifice forcedly, they wouldn’t have been sanctified inwardly, like the Jews and the pagans weren’t sanctified either. But for somebody must represent Christ Who brings Himself as sacrifice of all of us, he receives the individual sacrifices of the believers in unity with the sacrifice of Christ and in their unity amongst themselves, in order the Church’s sacrifice into Christ to be accomplished. This is the priest of the New Testament. He receives the sacrifices and the prayers of everybody and united those with the sacrifice of Christ, which he brings on behalf of everybody and for everybody. He frames everybody’s sacrifices and prayers in the Church’s sacrifice and prayer as a whole. The ministering priests do not bring only their personal sacrifices and prayers, but of the community as a whole and of all the believers, added to the sacrifice of Christ. In the priest it is accomplished the everybody’s unification, as in the seen image of Christ, the One Who bring Himself as sacrifice, in an unseen manner, through the priest as.” (Stăniloae 1997: 107)

“The priest of the New Testament differs from the priests as simple sacrificer of the Old Testament and of the pagans. He is different also for, in accord to the preponderance he has as spiritual unifying factor, to his mission belongs the preaching of the word and the shepherding as well of the believers, in order to form them spiritually, and he uses the preaching and the shepherding as means for maintaining the believers' unity in Christ and within Church, and as means of configuring the believers in the image of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 107-108)

"The priest's ministrations contribute to imprinting the image of Christ in the believer's being. The believers accomplish thus their general priesthood with the help of the ministering priesthood, not only as bringers of their own sacrifices but also as emperors over their passions and as teachers in family and society, being themselves sanctified through all of these ministrations and contributing to the sanctification of the world too, but without doing this like qualified representatives of the Church." (Stăniloae 1997: 108)

"The signification of calling the Holy Ghost upon the believer it is has also by the fact that the priest goes around the table used for Baptism, with the little child after the Mystery of the Baptism and of the Chrismation. If the candidate to priesthood goes around the Holy Table, showing by this his decision to bring the whole his life to Christ as sacrifice for the believers and his decision to officiate the Mysteries and to teach within Church, the layman or the member of the general priesthood is consecrated to the uninterrupted serving to Christ outside the altar, within world, through other means than by committing the Mysteries, but trying at his turn to keep the world around Christ, as on himself too." (Stăniloae 1997: 108-109)

"The priest is called to form the believers in bringing themselves as sacrifices and thus to consecrate their life to Christ, the priest himself being an example for this, so that one can say that the priesthood of the New Testament is the fulfillment of the non-full priesthood of the Old Testament and of the pagan religions in which it was expressed, mostly through external acts, the hope for the true sanctification of the world through the true sacrifices, fueled up, out of the consummate sacrifice of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 109)

"For the teaching and shepherding ministration of the priests actually contribute itself to the development of the general priesthood of the believers and to maintaining their unity in Christ, or to maintaining the unity of the Church, to configuring everybody in the sane unitary and authentic image of Christ, it must be exercised in a unitary manner as well. In order to provide this unity of teaching, of committing the Mysteries, of shepherding, or of forming the believers in the image of Christ and of themselves living according to this image, the priests need to have a superior center invested with the power from above, for preserving unchanged the teaching, the committing of the Mysteries, and the leading of the believers, according to the apostolic rule of the Church. This superior center is the bishop. The Church ensured the dependency of the priests on the bishop firstly by being them ordained by the bishop. Through ordination the priests are given the grace that means the power and the right of committing the Mysteries, of preaching the teaching and of shepherding. The dependency on the bishop ensures the accomplishing of these ministrations in the same unitary mode all over the eparchy - after the bishops has made sure that the ones who receive the ordination, they have the capacity of accomplishing appropriately these activities.” (Stăniloae 1997: 109)

“The bishop of an eparchy must stay in connection with the bishops of other eparchies, in order the unity of teaching, of committing the Mysteries and of evangelical living which he ensures in his eparchy, to be in accord with the teaching, with the committing of the Mysteries and with the apostolic living of the Church from everywhere.” (Stăniloae 1997: 109)

“In order to provide the unity of the Church, ever since the apostolic period, it has been established that any new bishop to be ordained by three, or at least two, bishops, and before ordination the bishop to be must confess in details his faith, proving thus that his faith is the same with the one of the bishops who ordain him on behalf of the entire episcopate of a autocephalous Church, which is in communion with the entire episcopate of the Church. By this, the bishop to be, he gives the guarantee that in his eparchy he will take care of being preached, under his guidance and teaching, the teaching of the Church from everywhere, and there will be officiated the same Mysteries and the believers’ life will be guided according to the same evangelical norms from the beginning of the Church. This detailed confession of the faith isn’t required to the priest either to the deacon, but only to the one who is going to receive the grace of the hierarchy, for he has to guarantee the preserving of the teaching and of the rules of the Mysteries and of the canonical rules in the Church shepherded by him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 109)

“Conveying the same grace from bishops to bishops, starting with the apostles, in the same time with conveying the power and the obligation of keeping the same teaching and the same norms of the Mysteries and of the shepherding, it is called apostolic succession. With this grace which comes from apostles are imparted, on the measure of their narrower ministration, from the bishop of each eparchy, all the priests of that eparchy, receiving in the same time with the grace also the power and the obligation of preaching the same teaching and of guarding the same rules in committing the Mysteries and in shepherding the souls on the path that is conform to the tradition that comes from apostles. Thus, the Church always lives spiritually out of the same grace and out of the same teaching and sacramental, evangelical and apostolic order.” (Stăniloae 1997: 110)

“The bishops are the branches which, by starting from the same apostolic trunk, they extend the grace and the content of the apostolic life in all the twigs - which are the priests -, and in all the leaves or fruits - which are the believers. Better said, the same sap that is Christ, it extends Himself through bishops and priests in the whole tree of the Church, being in an unmediated manner in each one of Church’s limbs. If there wasn’t the grace of the apostolic succession of the hierarchy and if there wasn’t the apostolic teaching conveyed in the same time with the grace, the Christians wouldn’t be baptized, the Christians wouldn’t be imparted with Christ in Eucharist, and they wouldn’t know Christ in His work within them as He was and worked in the whole past.” (Stăniloae 1997: 110)

“Through the apostolic succession of the episcopate it is ensured the integral preservation of the apostolic teaching, namely not only in its form as recorded in the New Testament, but also in its explicit form called the Holy Tradition. The Holy Tradition has been preserved through the apostolic succession in its oral and applied form. (...) And we know that what is left in writing it never covers everything that is conveyed through speaking and through applying. But the richness of this oral and applied thesaurus cannot be taken in from the antecessors except by the ones who stay for a long time with those ones. The apostolic succession of the hierarchy implies also this together living of the younger with the older one, namely a practical apprenticeship.” (Stăniloae 1997: 111)

“The episcopal charisma which bears in itself the power of conveying all the charismas and the gifts which have been conveyed since apostles, all the time, in the Church, or of conveying Christ Himself and His Holy Ghost, present and working in these charismas and gifts. If so, the episcopal charisma mustn’t be understood only as a channel that brings to us something old, but as a fire that is being transmitted with the same power of warming up, or like the water of a big river which penetrates the new soil which it reaches at, fertilizing it. The fire and the water of the gifts have been persisting in Church since its beginning. But they do not come only from the past, but also from above, on each time; for the Church is always open to the heavens. They are the sun warming up all generations, being through its rays in them, but penetrating them from above.” (Stăniloae 1997: 111-112)

“We feel Christ - Whom we receive today through Mysteries and through the teaching of the priests ordained by bishops and also from out parents – as present and alive in them, and that’s why He can penetrates us too. He is not a Christ of the past, except in the sense that He was the One living and working in the past generations too. He is always alive. Through the apostolic succession it is being provided the forever living permanence of Christ, the presence of the same Christ in all generations. Not Christ passes, but the generations pass. But all of them have been alive in Christ. And only in the same Christ we are alive too. But we receive the living Christ out of the ones who live in Him, together with whom we continue to live for a while in this living Christ. Only that they have received Him a little earlier. The succession is a continuous concomitance as well.” (Stăniloae 1997: 112)

“The teaching about Christ isn’t the only one constituting the content of the apostolic succession, or of the Tradition; if that was the case, it would become a theoretical teaching and seemingly an outdated one. Neither the grace of the Mysteries as work of Christ conveyed to us, it doesn’t form alone the content of the Tradition. In order the work of Christ to have full efficacy within us, we must know in detail Who is He and what He asks us for. Only together, the grace of Christ and His teaching and the teaching about Him, they convey us Christ in His living and efficient fullness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 112)

“The bishop must be unmarried, for his ministration doesn’t consists only of committing the Mysteries and of teaching the Christians in what regards the aspects of their faith, but it also consists of supervising this ministration as done by the priests as his helpers. His being must be entirely occupied with the care for the Church, and he must forget about any interest of his or of his family, like Christ did, Whom the bishop is a full representative.” (Stăniloae 1997: 115)

“As organ of Christ, the high priest has the most shacking responsibility for the souls’ salvation, he having to imitate Christ in humbleness and having to be an example of cleanness, of unselfishness, of gentleness, and of self-sacrificing. If he understands his role of representative of Christ as a reason for a power in worldly spirit, he will get himself far from Christ, and through him there will no longer accomplished, with the whole efficiency, the work of the gentle, humble, clean, and in state of continuous sacrifice Christ. As organ of Christ, he must be a role model of Christ and he will be held accountable when Christ will judge Him, about the way he accomplished his ministration in: if he has accomplished it well, he will have a greater reward, but if he has accomplished it wrong, he will have a worse condemnation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 118-119)

“The unsurpassed greatness of the priestly ministration it stays in the fact that it is mediation between people and God. If the prophet is the envoy of God towards people, for revealing His will to them and, through this, to give birth in them to the faith, the priest goes from bottom to top, from people towards God, with prayers and sacrifices for obtaining the forgiveness and the sanctification for the people. And the high priest is the foremost from the priests²²⁷. Through the priest, the man answers to the call God have made to him through the prophet. Only by both ministrations, it is fulfilled the religious report between God and people. Through priest, especially, it is manifested and upheld God's inclination towards people." (Stăniloae 1993)

"From the being of the priestly service, like, otherwise, also through the one of prophet, it turns out that there is something impeding the people to get closer to God, like the priest does. That something is nothing else, but the sin, the impurity of the thought and of the soul. The sin is an impediment of subjective nature, making the man incapable to raise at God Who is the consummate spiritual purity. God does not want to forcibly purify the man, because there is not about a physical impurity, but of a dirty inclination of the soul, is about a pettiness in all he thinks and feels. But this subjective incapacity reflects a subjective order set by God Who does not admit the closeness to Himself of the impure soul in all his movement and reasons. The incapacity of the people to get closer to God, it is shown also by the fact that the priest, by being human, he does not dedicate by himself to the mediation service, neither is him destined by people to that service, but he is chosen by God Himself (Heb. 5: 4). So, the opposition which we have established between him and the prophet, the prophet being the envoy of God towards people, and the priest being the envoy of the people towards God, it is much attenuated, because also the priest is chosen and made worthy by God towards his service. Though, his job remains the one of representing the people, from God's benevolence. The priest is a sign of the godlike benevolence, like the prophet I too." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Here emerges immediately the question: how it is possible that God makes some of the people to be able to approach Him, and the most of the people not? This one can, and this one can't? The answer to this question is double. First: if is natural that God not to renounce to all connections with the people, the sole modality this connection to still maintained the distance, the principle of the impossibility of the sin to have communion with the purity, it is this connection to be established through a mediator chosen by God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Among the priests of the Old Testament, the highest one was the hierarch. While the priests were bringing sacrifices on each day, but only into the Holy, the hierarch was bringing on a single day of the year such a sacrifice and with the blood of the animal he was entering the Holy of Hollies, spreading the cover of the Ark of the Covenant for the atonement of the sins of the entire community of the people. It was the sacrifice from the reconciliation day, symbolizing the reconciliation of the entire people with God, a universal reconciliation. The hierarch was not exceeding, though, neither him the signification of the priesthood and of the sacrifices of the Old Testament. But, by the fact that he was bringing the sacrifice on a single day of the year and then he was entering the Holy of the Hollies, and this was a rule established by God, it was shown that not the number increases the value of the sacrifice, but a single sacrifice brings more than all the other sacrifices together, but that one sacrifice must be of another kind than the ones of the animals, because neither the one brought by the hierarch was accomplishing the reconciliation. The effective sacrifice will be a sole one for the entire humanity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²²⁷ "(Hebr. 5: 1) For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins".

Prophets and Prophecies

“Christ is the supreme Prophet.” (Stăniloae 2003: 48)

“The Prophets from the Old Testament communicated a partial truth about God and about man, because of, by receiving the truth about God, they received it from God like from somebody else, and they couldn’t have it whole within themselves; and the man they knew, out of themselves, that man wasn’t the man fully accomplished in God. That’s why they neither could present the culminant relation between man and God and the whole result of the work of God upon man. On the other hand, by not being they identified to the truth they were communicating, they weren’t communicating that truth with the whole power of transforming other people, and they weren’t convincing about that truth through the culminant work of God in themselves.” (Stăniloae 2006: 50)

“The purpose of the prophets was to intermediate, and to uphold this connection, and to prepare the people for the future intimacy between God and them. The connection promulgated through prophets it was the Law of The Old Testament. (We are speaking here only about the positive, the unequivocal connection, searched for by God through the connection revealed in a supernatural manner, and not about the preparing into a wider sense, through the natural law, like it is observed at the pagan peoples). If we scrutinize the being of the law, not through its positive sense, but also through its insufficiency, we will ascertain the it had the role of preparing the full communion report between God and people.

But the ones who stood under the regime of the law couldn’t point satisfactory its insufficiency, because they have not tasted the happiness of the full report between God and man. The man who stays in darkness and who has not been imparted with the light, he can realize the insufficiency of the darkness, but he cannot satisfactorily specify its insufficiency, because he cannot compare it to the light. Only if we know the goods of the full Revelation - the final target towards which God wants to carry the man - we will be able to understand why those goods of the Revelation won’t be reached through the Law. And, if we know this target, we will be able to realize what kind of means are required in order to reach it, and, if we know those means also by experience, we will be able to appreciate their wonderful fit to the aimed target.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Here we remark that the prophet, by being an envoy of God, his being is a sign that there is a certain circumstance which impedes the man’s direct knowledge about God. This impediment cannot be but the sin, once that the simple fact that the human is a creature it does not stop God to destine him for a future full union with Himself. The sin has a voluntary humanly origin, which infected and thickened the man’s power of understanding. Because the reality which the man has to know, even if consists in nothing else but in the loving communion with God, he won't know it because he won't be able to place himself in that communion due to his egotistic will. The will of God, to make the man to know Him, is not enough. The man also, must force to purify himself of sin, namely of the spiritual egotism, of the proud and the sensual egotism of pleasures and passions." (Stăniloae 1993)

"How can though, some people, namely the prophets, to know God, so that, at their turn, they to communicate His will to the people? The fact is explained somewhat through the exceptional moral character of the ones called to be prophets. Being given the fact that the prophets will leaned entirely towards God, even if God has operated in them a purification through an act especially rapid in its efficacy, this fact wouldn't have been but an exception which confirms both the sinfulness of the big masse of the people, but also the God's will to not let them without any communication from His part." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The prophet, being a mediator of God towards people, is a demonstration of their sinfulness, of the separation between God and people. This is a fact which must to be highlighted. But just because the people cannot know God directly, their knowledge must to bear the character of the faith. The prophets make people to believe, not to now; or they transmit to them a knowledge based on faith. This is the second fact. And behold how the wisdom of God turns the things so as to, from a disadvantageous situation of the people, creates the possibility to know Him through faith, namely in the form in which he makes them to live. Either they would know God directly, or that they know Him through faith, mediated by prophets, the result is the same: the life into the ones who know Him. God cannot be known, without that His knowledge itself not to be life." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Even if the knowledge of the prophet has rather a character of faith, and not of experience, not of a direct sight. God presents Himself to the people with a certitude in which we feel the voluntary manhood of the faith. From His certitude lightens the certitude of the ones who listen to him. It is true that the Holy Scripture describes the diverse mysterious experiences and sight, which the prophets had. But these do not exclude, and they rather imply the faith. God still didn't show Himself unveiled... The prophet needed the faith in order to admit that under all of these forms there is God. The epistle towards the Jews, chapter 11, speaks aprioristically about the faith of the prophets (especially in the verse 32 and the followings). This confirms us the thesis that, by being given the sinfulness of the people, there doesn't exist even one man to see God uncovered. The prophets make no exception.

Of course, we can reduce the experience of the dialog with God, which the prophets had, to a simple faith resembling to the one of the other people. They have a kind of experiencing the reality, the divine presence, a “sight”, but though not as the faith would be unnecessary. Otherwise, the faith of every man is a kind of mysterious experience which has been produced and which persists within the soul, on the reality of God and on the communication of the things the prophet believed through God. The faith has a dialectic sense, being, on one hand, faith in the precise sense of the word, and on the other hand, experience, mysterious “sight” of the things which cannot be seen.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The prophet is, otherwise, on one hand, a humble man. He “does not know”, but he “believes”. He does not rely onto his discoveries and onto his reasoning, but on what God communicates him. But, on the other hand, he does not demonstrate through reasoning or intuitions his teachings, but he affirms his certitudes, and on another hand, or maybe just because of that, he is the teacher who exceeds any other worldly teacher, by creating in his fellow humans the same certitudes, by giving them birth at the rank of true people and by tying them to himself and among them, with a sincere, deep, and un-perishing love.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The interpretation given by the prophet it does not refer to his person. Its thread leads towards God on a path which is exterior to the prophet and to a subject, other than his. Confident in the word of the prophet, the listener forgets about the prophet and he goes with the faith towards the direction which this word leads him in. The mediation of the prophet lasts only for an instant. After he has indicated God, he steps aside.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“a) What is, for instance, subjective and what is objective in the vision of Isaiah’s prophecy (VI), about God sitting on a very high chair, in a house full of His glory, having around Him seraphs with six wings, covering their faces with two wings, their feet with other two wings, and flying with the two remaining wings? Or, what is subjective and what it is objective in the vision of the holy Tent had by Moses on Mount Sinai, or in the multitude of visions from Apocalypse?

Subjective are in those visions or images all the concrete forms which cannot exist in the divine spirituality and which the organ of the inspiration brings out of his world of occupations, of readings, out of the preoccupations of the time and of the social environment which he lives in. Farrer showed, in his commentary on Apocalypse, the connection of the visions from that book with the themes from Genesis, with the visions of Daniel, with the Judaic holidays, with some rabbinic exegeses on the mentioned themes. But he also showed what the entire material was reorganized like, focusing around Christ, and what it received new significations like, and what it has been crossed through by the idea of a developing of the history like, and of the history's end in the eternal kingdom of the light.

The force and the clarity of the dominant idea determined to gather up from the memory of the organ of the revelation all his means of expression, all the images stored in it, and to be organized so that to be expressed in the most adequately.

Upon the Isaiah's spirit it pressed insistently the feeling of a presence of a reality of supreme authority, respectfully surrounded by other realities. The image of a sovereign sitting on a very high throne in a very high house, surrounded with respect by very high beings, it is born within prophet as the most adequate form of catching and expressing this experience, which feeling causes him to recall and image which he ever saw or which he ever knew out of reading or listening, but which has received now extraordinary dimensions. The "very high chair", the "very high house", the beings standing around aren't earthly being etc.

On one hand, it happens something inverse, on the other hand something analogue to what happens in an artist's imagination. The artist sees in the complex of organs, in the attitude, in the movements, in the look, in the shapes of a man, a tendency, a dominant air. By making abstraction of the multitude of movements, of attitudes, of forms, under the powerful impression of the intention, of the dominant tendency concretized in them, in the artist's imagination appear a few more concentrated forms, more essential ones, which he catches more expressively in, more purely, the spiritual dominant of the respective man.

This dominant isn't else but the concrete forms which the artist catches it and expresses it in. But between this dominant and the forms which a true artist caught it and expressed it in, there is so much conformity that one could say that these forms preexisted virtually in it, that immediately when needed to naturally manifest or to be caught in the concrete world of the sensitive shapes, inevitably it must manifest and it must be expressed in the forms which it actually manifests or it is caught in.

So that, one can say, on one hand that that spiritual dominant pressing upon the capacity of specifying of the Revelation's organ or of the artist, it has in itself some "forms", but on the other hand those forms aren't material and, consequently, the spiritual dominant shapes the spirit of the "seer" – artist or organ of the Revelation –, by imprinting him, on one hand, with its "air" and, on the other hand, determining in him the gathering out of his memory and the organizing of the most adequate forms for expressing it – of course not without being added his effort, important especially for the stylization of the details belonging to the forms of catching and expressing the domination which presses upon his spirit. In this sense, noticing that spiritual dominant, done by the artist or the organ of the Revelation, it can be called as “spiritual sight” or “sight above sight”.

O similar description of this proceeding of birth of the visions we meet at the Holy Fathers. A series of their statements on this procedure were gathered together by Saint Gregory Palamas, who added also his own specification.

(...)

This “sight above sight” imprints the spirit with its “air” comprising in it a virtual image or complex of images, and it presses to express them by using certain images.

(...)

The spiritual divine reality does this imprinting not partially and not by remaining external, but by shaping the entire spirit of the seer, through His imprinting in the seer. Even the angels are shaped according to the divine reality.

(...)

Of course, these are templates imprinted from spirit to spirit, allowing a spirit to be shaped according to another spirit, or the present state of a spirit to be shapes according to the present state of another spirit. Noticing these typoi (spiritual forms, spiritual templates), might be compared to Wesenschau which Edmund Husserl spoke about, though this is more appropriately applied to the poet or to the philosopher, who notice the essence of something or of somebody in sensitive forms, while the organ of the Revelation notices it outside forms and he strives after that to express it in forms. Though, it also takes place that the divine “spiritual template” puts on the images taken from the seer’s images repository. But between the spiritual template and the forms which he puts on, there is such an adequate bond that it seems that those forms would be potentially inscribed in the template, and they are gradually specified to the seer, who is used through his sensitiveness to materialize everything. It seems that the images from the seer’s memory are polarized under the attractive force of something kindred to them, out of the spiritual template. Another difference from poet or from philosopher, it is that the religious organ is himself shapes by the ethical force of the template, thus becoming a different kind of man and preaching such a life.

The templates aren’t “views” lacking the cogitation, but they cause noticing of spiritual order, combined with the cogitation, or simply above cogitation, but causing the cogitation.

(...)

By and large, the heart, namely the man within each of us, it is shaped by God, as Prophet David said.

Of course, not always this “air”, this “tenure”, this “intention” of the spiritual reality, seen by an organ of the Revelation (or by an artist), or imprinted in him in such a measure than the organ is shaped according to it, it causes a mobilization of sensitive images, a new combination of theirs, a new dimensioning, and a discovery of new significations in them, but they often cause only a mobilizations of words, new combinations of these words, for out of these new combinations, often contradictorily, to gush out meanings adequate to the “seen” spiritual reality. But, at their turn, these words have something material in them, if not else at least by the fact that they originally served for expressing sensitive realities.

But always when it comes about only foretelling the future, or of something that must be fulfilled by people, the first one who is not only shaped according to the model he saw, but who also strives to shape himself, it is the organ of the Revelation. Only thus the Revelation is easily received. The word typous, used in the writing of the Holy Fathers in order to designate the “forms” shows to the Revelation’s organ, it is taken from the New Testament, where it is used just with the meaning of “model” which the believers must adapt themselves to.

(...)

Saint Apostle Peter asks the priests not to reign but to become “role models” of the flock (I Peter V: 5).

Saint Apostle Paul urges Tit to become “role model” in some attitudes of spiritual order (“in seriousness”) (Tit. II: 7), confirming thus the idea that are “role models or spiritual forms” (see also I Ephes. I: 7).

Now we can come back to the real, definitive images of the Revelation, as there are the stages of Jesus Christ’s existence, or also exterior but of passing character images of the Revelation, in order to explain their connection with the human activity.

The human spirit must experience, in the report with them too, and form their part too, a shaping, in order to notice them as images of the divine reality. They are prolonged thus in the human subjectivity, and it is achieved a connection between their external reality and the inside of the seer; namely they aren’t purely external. If they had remained purely external, they wouldn’t have been noticed as forms of the divine presence. It is like in the case of the artist having the gift of expressing a meaning though a shape, due to a feeling of his which, not being had by others, they cannot do the same.

The difference between the external, definitive or passing images, of the Revelation, and the purely internal images, it is that the first one can be shown to others too, or they can be seen by others too - if not by everybody as images of the divinity, at least as external real shapes. Their forming doesn’t take place in the internal subjectivity of a man. But without a subjective openness one cannot see in these images what is above the natural plan. Thus, knowing God in the external and historical reality it is an internal sight, by faith, and it is not rigidly imposed to whomsoever. “Actually, said Saint Gregory Palamas, our faith is a sight above sight”. Even when it is not only faith but it is also sight, it still has in itself an element of faith, implying a contribution of the subjectivity; it is not generally imposed. Saint Gregory Palamas noticed that often, the light on Tabor, though shining brighter than the sun, it wasn't seen by the ones from the bases of the mountain.

b) But if the subjective factor is absolutely necessary in order to notice a fund of the Revelation, what the organ or the Revelation – or every believer – achieves the surety like, that he is in a front of an objective fund? This is the most difficult matter. Only out of the indirect witnesses of some organs of the revelation one can deduce some signs which this objective character is manifested through, and of whose surety is affirmed, with determination, by those organs.

A sign of this objective character of the visions' fund it is the experience of a state of receptiveness which they had towards that fund. The seer realizes that it was not him inventing that fund, but that fund has been given to him for contemplation, for noticing, and for expressing it, even if in the way which he expresses it in, it is required his effort too.

The man expresses himself, on those moments, empty of all his contents of ideas, of memories, of cogitation efforts, and of sentiments. By this, he realizes that what he sees it doesn't spring out of the crossing of his soul's and mental contents, through his own efforts of deepening and combining them. On this way, "the spiritual model of template" it appears to him suddenly as something totally different from everything he is. This state is lived also like some kind of passiveness state. The seer "sees", but he doesn't make the effort to discover what he "sees", or even the effort to see the "model", the "template"; it is a gift, and it is even imposed to him; the "model" or the "template" exercises a pressure upon the seer's spirit.

If there are mobilized and organized in the seer images or words in order to interpret what he "sees", this is mainly done without his effort, under the force of the "seen" reality. The seer's effort is needed only for retouching the details.

The force which the evidence of a "template" is imposed with – or of "some templates –, it is to the seer an imperative force, on one hand to notice it, and on the other hand to communicate what he "sees". "Woe to me if I won't talk about it", often the prophets shout out. The experience of the objective character of the vision's fund it is now as accentuated as possible. The Revelation's organ hears even some kind of commandment in this sense: "Do what you have seen like, or how it has been commanded to you; go and tell". The imperative force of the objective reality of the Revelation it has taken for the Revelation's organ the audible form or image of some kind of voice, of some kind of word.

Even moreover, the objectivity goes so far that the image, or the string of images, it receives some sort of autonomy in the seer's spirit, though, on the other hand, everything takes place within him. It is here an objectivity in subjectivity, something that exceeds the border between subjectivity and objectivity. Although, this phenomenon has nothing in common with the hallucination, which is the symptom of an ill man and in whom everything takes place in a chaining lacking the coherence and the lucidity and the effect is a getting worse of the illness state of the patient. A contrary, the Revelation's organ is characterized by lucidity, by an acute self-awareness, and by an ethical coherence in the whole his behavior. He doesn't copy his vision, but he is new, and by this he indicates a new stage in the ethical human progress. By being the divinity spirit, and the divinity's unveiling being addressed to the human spirit, there is no wonder that in this encounter between the divine pure spirit and the human spirit there takes place an exceeding of the exteriority that accompanies any report of the man with the material realities and even with other people, who are as at their turn dressed up in bodies.

Taking in account this passiveness of the Revelation's organs, the Holy fathers spoke more about the action of shaping, of imprinting, exercised upon them, by those 'views', and less about the effort to ethe revelatory organs in shaping themselves.

(...)

The explanations given in the previous pages, according to Saint Gregory Palamas, we find them in essence – applied, of course, to the poetical knowledge – at a Romanian philosopher too, in his exposition on the mode what the human subject encounters the reality in, the reality being, on one hand objective, but on the other hand the reality become internal to the subject in this encounter. The reality is lived, according to this philosopher, as a full that fills up the object that is a void, as a full that forms with the void which is filling up, a unity. The reality filling up the subject and shaping the subject it is offered to the subject, in the beginning, as a general "fore-word", which is later specified in images and words. The Romanian philosopher uses for this shaping of the subject by the content gilling the subject up, without the subject ceasing, on the other hand, top know himself as differing from the content that has filled him up and that has shaped him, and which he expresses, by expressing himself in the same time – the image of two circles one blue (B) and another red (R), partially covering one another, they produce the (V) area, of violet color.

The subject A, shape in the V area by the subject R, it has become in that area one with the object R, but also the subject R has become in that area one with the subject A, having V as common result. This means, in our conception, that ins the subject have appeared some "templates", some "intentions", or some "airs" of the reality, which, in the analyzed by us case, belong to the divine reality Who has adapted Himself to the human subject's possibilities of noticing and of expressing, and Who has humanized Himself and Who has deified the human. The human subject notices through the "fore-word" both on himself and the reality which has shapes him, or which has shaped itself according to the human subject. But, in the same time, the human subject preserves the conscience of his differing from the divine reality, for he distinguished in the same time on himself and the divine reality as factors encountering one another without merging.

The difference in the encounter of the subject with the Godhead would consist especially of the fact that here the fore-word is live by man not only as inspired by the presence of a reality of the object's character, but it is also lived as an echo of a claim, or a word above word, of God lived as Person. The human word corresponds to the divine reality not only as meaning become conscious within man, but in a fuller manner, as noticing a divine commandment and as answer to that. The whole man lives in the encounter with the divine reality as engaged in a dialogue with God, as listening partner of the godlike word and who answers the godlike word. The whole man is shaped as listening and answering being, in the encounter with God, and out of living this quality of his, it springs out within man the word as recording the divine word in human form, and as answer given to the divine word. And such lives on himself the man who is imprinted by God and who is in the same time different from God.

Out of this living of God as commanding word (not articulated in human words, but articulated as intention), it comes the need of the man for expressing to the other too, this commanding word of God through his human words. And only for the man has this capacity and he lives this obligation of "expressing" the word of God through human words, the man has also the capacity of living and the need for noticing and expressing the reality as object, in words, on behalf of his fellow humans." (Stăniloae 2005: 32-41)

"The "future good things" couldn't have been indicated from far away only through elements taken exactly from nature. In order these good things to me more easily understood in their untold beauty, for they have nothing corresponding in the present reality, the Revelation of the Old Testament used also "visions", combining in bizarre modes, often contradictorily, a multitude of faces of the present reality and projected them in huge dimensions, in order to be shown the fact that these good things aren't in an exact likeness to the faces which were mostly of the times natural and passionate, but in order to be in the same time shown a negation of theirs, and an amplitude exceeding any known measures. By coming Christ, in Whom these visions have been fulfilled in the whole their amplitude, and they have been even surpassed, these visions and prophecies no longer have a purpose. When those good things are described in their final and complete extension upon everybody, one starts always from the reality of Christ, by showing through words their generalization upon everybody, as Saint Apostle Paul does for so many times (for instance: Ephes. I: 4). Only Apostle John, by insisting upon this generalized apparition of the glorified presence of Christ, and also upon the road to be traveled to there, he uses visions. But these visions too, they are focused around Christ, around the Bleeding Lamb, around the Son of Man Who will take the final victory, of the Lamb celebrating his feats with His Bride, which is the universal Church." (Stăniloae 2005: 28)

“The prophecy isn’t an external criterion by which a fact of the supra-natural Revelation is proven, but the prophecy is part of the supra-natural Revelation’s essence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 39)

“Even the natural Revelation had a prophetic dynamism.” (Stăniloae 2003: 39)

But, because any prophet does not bring faith on earth for the first time the, but he refreshes it with an unusual energy and highlights certain elements from its content, the most important prophet is the first man who believed. Through him, for first time, the Revelation descended into the world. And, because the man without faith he is not a man, the first man who believed, and the first man who received the Revelation, he coincides to the first man in general.

But we insist upon the way which the divine Revelation is introduced into the world in. We are mentioning only the fact that its propagation is being done through people, during the history. Although, not like people would by themselves in conveying the Revelation, like in case of transmitting different cultural goods. In order to be a transmitter of the Revelation, the man must be conquered by the work of God, which produces in him the faith, but this conquest takes place through a man who had believed before and so on, because, otherwise, the man wouldn’t have been a simple propagator of the Revelation, but he would have descended the faith again on earth. The propagation of the Revelation is accomplished through the chaining the generations of people, during history, and not only through them, but also through God.

The results which we have obtained in the course of the exposé until here, they will be clarified, if we are trying now to highlight the capacity of the man to be propagator of the Revelation, and the value and the fulfillment that gives him this role. This will help us understanding even further, the motives for which the Son of God has become man.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Providence

“In the liberty of the divine spirit it is given both the possibility of the various interventions of God within world, and the power of making that the effects of these interventions to be way wider, more sensitive, and more efficient, than the interventions of the human liberty can be. Speaking about the divine Providence, we must understand the work of God, Who, on one hand He preserves the world in its elastic, contingent state, and on the other hand, it leads the world: usually in the world’s natural state, but sometimes through direct interventions or through the human activity, towards the world’s target as environment of supreme transparency.” (2003: 388)

“Because of the evil isn’t a factor acting identically in order to maintain the world further in the state the sin has introduced it into the world, the preserving Providence, at its turn, it doesn’t act always identical in maintaining the world in existence despite the shortcoming from within the world. The evil searches - by the always new initiatives of the evil ghosts and of the people influenced by them - for maintaining the evil within world, in new forms, and for imprinting the evil increasingly deeper into the world, by hoping for the total destruction of the world; the Providence, at its turn always new in its modes of maintaining the world in existence, of defending the world, it is using both its own forces and the good actions of the people – either the people always support the good or they do it intermittently. Through the multiplication of the people as factors of the good and of the evil, always original but having the memory of the past, God leads the world to always new phases.” (2003: 511-512)

“The world is being brought, even by the conservator Providence, forwards. In other words, it is difficult to discern between the conservative Providence and the governing Providence.” (2003: 512)

“The dynamic sense of the conservative Providence it is though activated more accentuated on the plan of the history of the conscious human beings, of their development. The Providence helps here the forces of the good not only for maintaining themselves and the mankind in the same forms, but also to fence up and to counteract the new forms of action of the evil.” (2003: 512)

“It is being maintained thus the equilibrium between the evil’s forces and the forces of the good, being in the same time reconciled to a progress of the conscious beings. A laziness of the good in developing itself it wouldn’t be any good. The conservationism of an imperfect state it is an evil too. But, after the falling into sin the progress into good it is being done in a struggle against the evil; the evil, by the ambiguity characteristic to it, it brings ideas and impulses which are to a point good, and which in this state no longer produce the opposition of the good, but it determines also the ones who serve the good to accomplish with sincerity and fuller the idea and the impulses which are incompletely or apparently good, though they belong to the evil's forces. Actually, no conscious being can totally escape the force of the good. Thus, God uses both the evil forces and the good force, in order to lead the history towards higher stages, ultimately towards salvation and deification, and this is for the Providence implies the synergy between God and the conscious creature.” (2003: 512)

“The leading of the world forwards, as work of the Providence, that is done with the collaboration of the world, and it cannot be totally separated from a certain creator, progressive work of God, though it is different from the Creation itself, for it uses the foundation laid through creation. For instance, also through synergic Providence, God leads the matter to the phase the man can be created and placed into the world. Bringing to existence other and other people, it is at its turn a creator work of God, and not only a leading of the world towards the target of the people's consummation in communion with Him.” (2003: 512-513)

“In history's advancing – according to the Christian teaching –the godlike Providence has a great role, through these new stages God opens to the conscious creature, and by leading the creation towards these stages, and by elevating the creation on these stages. Of course, neither in this action God works alone, but with the collaboration of the human action. But the supra-natural Revelation highlights the initiative and the role of God above any equivocal.” (2003: 513)

“The Providence is received by the existent ones, but the godlike being is non-shareable.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 81)

“The God's power and work not only create and uphold the creatures in existence, by not using anything in order to do that, but God's power and work also uphold the creatures in their own works, adding to the natural power the creatures have been given through creation, also God's supra-natural power. The upholding power and work are permanent, strengthening, and consummating, and they are communicated as gift only to the one who believes and who want co co-work with them. The upholder work of God it requires from God and from creature, a relation based on freedom, a relation that doesn't confound the beings, whilst the creator and upholder work of God is a free manifestation belonging only to God. This makes possible also a collaboration, in freedom, of the creature, and, sometimes, it makes possible also a consciously refusal of collaboration with God, or even a working against God. The free will of God has created, through a power of His, a natural power given to the people, and He gives the people one more power, for they to have it in common with Him, or in order to make the creatures as together-subjects with Him, of His power that is from above their nature.” (Stăniloae 1995: 24)

Rationality

“The rationality of the subject who uses consciously the rationality of the nature – on the purpose of surviving and of his good development -, his rationality is infinitely superior to the nature’s rationality, because the nature unveils in itself rigidly and without being aware of a purpose of its own.” (Stăniloae 2003: 20)

“The reason why a long period of preparation with a pronounced moral character it is needed, in order to reach to contemplating at once the rationalities from things and from deeds, it is because our rationality doesn’t remain, in any conditions which we live in, invariably having the same capacity of objectively noticing the truth. According to the usual expression of the Holy Fathers, our rationality it “weakens”, it doesn’t firmly keep its sovereign position as objective judge. What attracts our rationality off the throne it is the passions. The passions make our rationality to invent rational arguments for justifying any sinful deed. And because of the sinful facts abusing of things, by reckoning the things only as objects of material satisfaction, and by this the rationality justified as rational an irrational behavior, the rationality finds to the things too, rationalities which aren’t actually theirs, but they are in fact rationalities presenting the things in an altered light, namely false rationalities.” (Stăniloae 1992: 171)

“In front of a rationality that has fallen to the role of servant to the passions, the world’s vision suffers the following modifications:

1) The deeper, or the more “spiritual” rationalities of the things are being covered up, being seen only the materialistic and of bodily utility side of them. For instance, the beauty of an apple, the sweetness of a grape, they are no longer seen as having the purpose of making us to know that in God there are energies creating beauty and sweetness, knowledge which we should remain even there are no longer apples or grapes, but the only remaining is the idea that they simply stir up and satisfy a bodily appetite. On the beauty of the young women, they say that it is a tempting form produced by nature in order to serve the species multiplication. The material features of the things make a wall that impedes any sight beyond them. The world becomes exclusively material and useful, or usable exclusively bodily. The tree of knowing the good and the bad it simply becomes pleasant “to sight” and “tasty” to eat. Therefore, the horizon gets narrowed.

2) The rationality of the passionate or of the interested, it strives to justify with arguments belonging to the general interest, the deeds committed out of personal interest. And what is remarkable to the slippery character of the rationality it is that the rationality actually reaches to convince itself of the “truth” of this argumentation. This means replacing some objective rationalities for some subjective rationalities. Of course, these subjective “rationalities” aren’t actually rationalities; they are passionate “rationalities”, while the true rationalities are objective and I discover them when I experience that my judgments obey the rationalities from within things and not vice versa – the last case being a new crookedness, a new falling off the truth.” (Stăniloae 1992: 171)

Repentance

“The repentance, if it is strong, it will produce the mellowing of the petrified state of the soul, the mellowing of the dry land, placing it in state of fructification; it melts down the frozen states of the waters, of the river which our soul is, making him flowing, in order to water all the ones who comes close to him in order they to become alive again and in order to give them life. That’s why all the ascetic books tie the repentance to tears, which are the sign of the mellowing.” (Stăniloae 1997: 193)

“The attitude asking for the cultivation of the virtues for the whole life and that that hopes for the forgiveness in Christ, they can be reconciled in the advice that the man to force himself as much as he can in order to follow Christ during the whole his life; but for everything the man hasn’t accomplished because of his weakness inevitably tied to the human nature, let him not despair, but to repent and to ask for forgiveness. But there happens also the case when a man, not behaving thus, he awakens at the end of his life to repentance, which fills up his soul with a trust in Christ, and with a love for Him, more than somebody filled in up through the whole “justice” he has been cultivating during his whole life. Of course, this doesn’t mean that the man has consciously prolong his living in sins, thinking that he will straighten everything through the repentance form the end. This is because such a living can create a habituation in frivolity, one equally callous in his soul as his trust in his own justice.” (Stăniloae 1997: 193)

“The fear of God, upheld by the awareness of a sinful life, it leads, on one hand, to repentance for the past sins, and on the other hand, it leads to avoid, through restraint, the future sins.” (Stăniloae 1992: 104)

“The purification work is accomplished through the powers emanating out of the Mystery of Baptism and out of the Mystery of the Repentance, as well as the illumination I s an actualization of the powers which we are given with through the Mystery of the Chrism, and the union with God is an effect of the Eucharist. The Baptism’s grace is the man’s new seed. As it grows up, it makes the traces of the old life to weaken, by absorbing that life’s powers and by using for itself. The Baptism is death to the former man, in two meanings: firstly, as deadly wound inflicted to the former man, by laying down the beginning of the new man, and secondly, as gradual mortification of that one’s convulsions which will last for a while until disappearing. But sometimes it happens that the remanence of force still in the former man though he is thrown down on earth, it is reinvigorated through new sins. Then is necessary a new pouring of grace from God, in order the new men to resume with even more vigor the action of purifying the traces of the old man. Better said, when remained powers from the former man have grown up again too much, or when the passions have grown up in the way of the powers from Baptism so that these ones can no longer advance, the repentance comes to remove the passions, in order to make way to the grace from baptism. We would say that the repentance fights rather its face towards past, while the Baptism fight with its face towards future. The repentance removes the garbage gradually accumulated within soul, in order to make way to the thriving of the new man born at Baptism. While the Baptism's grace restores our nature's tendencies towards good, the repentance's grace strengthens our nature's tendency towards regretting what we have done wrongly." (Stăniloae 1992: 104-105)

"Saint Mark the Ascetic comprises in his permanent repentance the ceaseless prayer (I believe that it is about the prayer asking for forgiveness), the banishing away of the evil thoughts, and operation that must always keep us occupied because of always coming sinful thoughts which we must regret and banish them away, and the enduring of the troubles, by reckoning that through enduring the sufferance we are healed up of past mistakes and imperfections. Even when we do a good, we must repent, he says, because of this showing us that we could have done that good even before, and we are guilty of not having it done. The good from today must awaken us to repentance for the good we didn't do it yesterday." (Stăniloae 1992: 105-106)

"The powers which we are given through repentance, they bring a new intensification of the work of the powers which are prolonged through the Mystery of the Baptism." (Stăniloae 1992: 105)

"The Holy Fathers know two forms of the repentance: there is the repentance as Holy Mystery and the repentance as permanent work within soul. But the power of the second one it comes from the first one." (Stăniloae 1992: 105)

"The idea of a permanent repentance it corresponds to the idea of repentance by and large. If the repentance is a shovel turned backwards in order to clean the man of the sins he has done since Baptism, in order the new man to be able to advance fighting - through the Baptism's power - the temptations he is facing, then it is obvious that we, by mistaking almost on every moment, namely by almost never winning a irreproachable victory upon a temptation, but only a partial victory, there is needed a regret which to accompany us steadfastly, which to steadfastly humble us, namely a voice which to always criticize the imperfection of the committed deeds, this fact constituting by itself an urge to an even bigger straining of our future work." (Stăniloae 1992: 105)

"John Climacus comprises at his turn, in repentance, not only a regret for the past sins, but also a working of the virtues and a suffering of all troubles. "The repentance is the reconciliation with the Lord, by working the virtues opposed to the mistakes. The repentance is the suffering of all troubles." (Level V, G.P., 88, 764)." (Stăniloae 1992: 106)

“Saint Isaac the Syrian grants to repentance three attributes: 1) it is the highest amongst virtues; 2) it never ends while we live; 3) it is a means of our continuous consummation.

1) Taken in itself, without any doubt, the virtue of the love it is higher than the virtues of the repentance. But our earthly condition doesn't allow us to accomplish the love in all its purity and fullness – as it also doesn't allow us to accomplish any other virtue. We realize on each moment that our love or any other virtues or ours it hasn't accomplished a maximum which us to be content with. After any act of virtue and of love we ascertain that it has been mixed with an impure element, or it could have been even fuller. This fact causes a discontent regarding what we have done, and this is the heart of the repentance. The repentance is the position of judge of our conscience, not only over our own sins, but also over our own virtues, because of us accomplishing those virtues in a not-consummate form. Our conscience doesn't miss anything; it doesn't forgive anything; it doesn't cover up anything. There is no virtue which not to be exposed to the repentance's severe and unyielding exam. But couldn't one say that our repentance too, it can be incomplete, and therefore the repentance too, it could be submitted to a judgment of our conscience, which in this case would be higher than the repentance? Of course it could: the incomplete and the impure repentance will be judged too, by repentance too, by a fuller repentance and not by another virtue. The repentance is the conscience's act of criticizing; it is the self-criticism of the man. As such, the repentance is the conscience's act of judgment and we know that all things will be submitted to judgment. But there is judgment and judgment. There is the judgment one does upon somebody else and there is the judgment you do upon yourself. In the judgment you do upon somebody else there can be mixed the sentiment of pride, while in self-criticism the pride is excluded. In self-criticism there can be at most some lenience. But a self-criticism or a lenient repentance, by leaving the man discontent, it itself tends to a more objective and a more severe one. Shortly, any sin, any non-fullness in virtue, they are submitted to the self-criticism or to the repentance. Even the insufficiency of the criticism or of the repentance, it is blamed through repentance too. In this sense, no virtue stays above repentance and no virtue can avoid the judgment forum of the self-criticism. Thus, the repentance is road towards love, it stays in the service of the love, and it leads from an insufficient love to even more love. That's why there is no contradiction between saying that the greatest virtue is the love and reckoning the repentance as being the greatest virtue. This is for the engine of the repentance is the love.”

2) If it is so, it will be obvious that the repentance follows, or it will have to follow, after each act, after each state, after each word of ours. The repentance follows after sins, and it follows after virtues, which are always non-full. The repentance tends to become a permanent current in our conscience, an uninterrupted presence, leading to even more love. The other dispositions and acts of ours they change according to the circumstances; the repentance is with each of them, it is the thread tying all of them. Not only the simple conscience that I am the bearer and the author of all my past dispositions and acts, not only the memory I have about them it ties them together, but it is also the repentance or the memory stained with the discontent I have because of the way I did them. No man is indifferent to his past or no man has a purely theoretical knowledge. This would steal from the present moment too its existential sap. The man embraces his past with a palpitating interest. But this full of passion attitude towards past it is one of haughtiness, of satisfaction, and in this case the man wants that not only him to be satisfied with what he has achieved, but he demands the recognition from other people; or it is an attitude of repentance, of discontent. In the last case, the people's praises make him feel bad, because of, on one hand, he knows what little those praises correspond to his inner evidences like, and he know better the reality in what regards himself, because of those praises tend to cover up the reality, to deceive him, to weaken his sincerity with himself, to darken his transparency, either they be sincere or simple flattering.

But this repentance, following us as our shadow, it mustn't be confounded to a discouraging discontent, which to paralyze all our efforts. This repentance mustn't be a doubt in our greater possibilities, but it must be an ascertaining of the insufficiency of our achievements until now. If it is discouragement it will be in itself one of the gravest sins. Not out of the sentiment that nothing can really be done good, our heinous conscience utters, relentlessly, a critical judgment upon our past deeds, but out of the deep sentiment that one can work even better, out of experiencing some mysterious powers which are much greater than those of our own nature, which can be constantly strengthened by the godlike powers, out of the sentiment that in what we did and in the way we behaved we didn't achieve but only in an insufficient measure and in a pale mode, what we are really capable of doing. The repentance expresses the thought: "There can be better". The discouragement, on the opposite, it says: "This is all I can do. I cannot do better." Properly-said, the discouragement is opposite to the repentance, because of where one cannot expect any better, there the regret doesn't take place. There is a fatalist sentiment, a skeptic resignation. The repentance is carried by a faith in better.

There are two characteristics making out of repentance a forum that is somehow above the man and within man, that always elevate the repentance above the moral and spiritual levels it reaches at. The repentance is a judgment that is always above our accomplishments and actualizations. No matter what high we elevates us morally like, the repentance will climb even higher. Is the repentance a judgment in the name of an ideal? Yes it is, but the repentance doesn't judge not in the name of a simple, subjectively cogitated ideal. If this had been the case, the repentance wouldn't have filled us up with so much restlessness, with so much unhealed and restless burdening. The repentance is awakened and upheld by the intuition of the presence of an authority above us, to whom we feel ourselves as responsible, but which gives us also power to do increasingly more, if we ask for this. The repentance is to us a transparent towards God, it is the pin which God constantly pricks our heart with, and it is His hand which He pulls us always upwards with. The repentance shows us as being in connection with that Somebody. If we weren't in this relation, we wouldn't be placed with the face or our soul towards a personal and supreme judgment forum, and the repentance wouldn't be explainable and it wouldn't have where to sound within us from, the absolute claims and judgment of the repentance.

As we said, the repentance isn't only the judgment upon my past deeds and feelings, but it is also a trust in my greater possibilities of my powers while always strengthened by the power of the infinite God. The repentance was reckoned by Isaac the Syrian as the highest amongst virtues. In this last quality of it, the repentance proves to be standing in a connection with sources of power from beyond man. The being of the repentance as the being of the humbleness too – which the repentance is not-separated from -, it is of dialectic character; it comprises in itself an intertwining of contradictory positions, which do not reciprocally annul on each other, but they yield a very complex reality. On one hand, it is a steadfast and unshaken trust in huge possibilities. "I am the greatest sinner", says the repentance's man, "I am unworthy". Despite all these, he never loses his confidence, he isn't by any means engulfed by the thought that he will be lost, and he doesn't let himself to be sunk in discouragement and in the idleness of the soul's death. They explain this persistence in the soul's strength through the fact that the man that repents he trusts God, as a factor differing from him. But the trust is itself an inward power. So, on one hand, one experiences here his own helplessness, and on the other hand, he experiences a great power. Obviously this is a power which isn't out of the resources of the isolated self, but it is in a communication with the vast and deep resources of the reservoir of universal spiritual power of God. The repentance is a relation with God, but by its character of absolute judge, and by its non-discouraging manhood which it urges the man towards better.

The repentance is the highest amongst virtues for it isn't in itself a doing virtues amongst all other virtues, but for, by remaining always discontent regarding what those virtues accomplish, it pushes them always higher. Without being a separate doer virtue, the repentance is an engine of all virtues. If there hadn't been the repentance, there wouldn't have been surpassing within man. The repentance is a ceaseless burning within man which maintains the straining towards better. Through repentance, by trampling the man on himself, and by judging on himself on behalf of the absolute pretensions of God, the man is being elevated always higher.

3) We have reached now the third characteristic of the repentance which Saint Isaac the Syrian grants the repentance with, by reckoning the repentance as a means of continuous consummation of the man, a means that itself consummates ceaselessly.

Saint Isaac the Syrian compared this world to a sea, and the repentance he compared it to a ship crossing us to the shore of the happy life from beyond, in the paradise having a being the love. (...)

The way on this life's sea, if we want it to be a continuous getting closer to the Paradise's shore, to the love's shore – which is Christ Himself –, and if we do not want it to be a wandering without anchor and until sinking in the sea's darkness, namely if we want it to be a way towards consummation and towards life, we will have to go on it ceaselessly in the ship of the repentance for the non-full love we showed through our sins, for the will of a greater love it drives us ever further. The repentance holds us above the huge waves of the evil, or of the egotism arising out of us, and it takes us ever further. Only in the boat of the repentance we cross over the sinful waves of our egotism which tend to arise from depths from within us and from beneath us. Only through repentance we are always above ourselves and in movement beyond the point where we are on a given moment, by getting closer to the full love and to the Paradise where the tree of life is in, namely Christ, the source of the love nourishing our spirit.

Of course, to some extent, we are partakers to the love that keeps increasing, even before we reach the golden shore of the Paradise's full love. The air of that realm comes in our way with its increasingly richer fragrance, as we are getting closer to that realm. Our love, and by and large all other virtues of us they become increasingly purer, and increasingly closer to fullness, on the measure we are directing ourselves towards the love's kingdom.

From here one can see that the repentance mustn't be separated from the love for God and for people. We will repent only if we have love. We repent for we have transgressed the commandments of the love, or because we reckon that we do not have enough love. Let's not wonder about the fact that the tumult of egotistic lusts and passions, about the fact that the evil by and large, are likened to an ocean. There is a lower kingdom of the evil, as there is a high kingdom of the good, and there is a long road in increasingly overcoming the sins' egotism. The man doesn't cogitate and he doesn't lust the evil in isolation. The impulses towards evil from within man they do not have within man their ultimate roots, their ultimate starting point, as also the aspirations and the impulses towards good do not sip their being and power only out of man. We stay in visible bonds, and especially in invisible bonds, with deep and countless forces of the evil, which start out of personal beings more powerful than we are, forces which continuously combine amongst themselves and with our impulses, as we are also helped by aerial winds or urges towards good started out of the high, vast, and great kingdom of the angelic and godlike kingdom, which blow in our being's sails. There are a, ocean of the good and an ocean of the evil, both of them claiming us. But the evil's ocean is dark, tumultuous, killer of spirit, annulling the freedom, killer of cleanness and quietude; it is a black ocean, subterranean, chocking, as a torrent of waters, whilst the ocean of the good, of the love, it is rather as an infinite ocean which we cannot live without, which breeze we cannot advance without, a clean sky or atmosphere giving us a wide, free breathing, which filters within us a renewed life and a ceaseless and untold joyfulness; it is the atmosphere of clean love and communion, life giver, which awakens all our soul's powers and gives them power to advance." (Stăniloae 1992: 106-111)

"How comes that through repentance we gradually detach ourselves from the evil's ocean, from the thousands of its hugs, and we advance towards the kingdom of the full love? What makes out of repentance a vehicle of love? The repentance is the fire gradually consuming the egotism from within us. All the passions stirred up within us, often triggered out of dark depths from beyond us, they strengthen our egotism. Either be they bodily passions, or soul's passions, they aren't but the heads of the same dragon called egotism. The repentance relentlessly stalks any raising of this dragon's heads, any dragon's attempt to nourish itself, to expand in the soul, of filling up with its stench our soul's well-intentioned thoughts, act, and words, in order to weaken our soul's powers to remain in contact with the love's sky, in order to drag our soul to the depths. The repentance cuts away, with its sword, one by one, the dragon's heads, and it burns the dragon up with the flame of the self-criticism's watchfulness, and it banish the dragon away with the good fragrance of the humbleness. What could more deadly wound our egotistic pride than the perpetual presence of the thought that we are nothing, that everything we have done is bad and worthless?" (Stăniloae 1992: 111)

"Obviously, nobody could get closer or to enter the kingdom of love, or this Paradise, except by letting behind himself the ocean of the infinite mermaids of the egotism which are searching for drawing him in as much violent waves. And one cannot overcome this ocean at once. One cannot fly with one flapping of wings from the empire of the egotism in the kingdom of love. This road must be walked gradually, by relentlessly fighting the infinite arms which the egotism tries to hold us with, and to draw us beneath. On each step, we must strenuously fight for in order to cross ahead, as another Odysseus, towards our real country. By strongly oaring, our muscles are being strengthened, and the road becomes ever easier to us. The repentance is the criticizing eye not letting itself deceived by the false pleasure provided by our egotism and it stops us from answering affirmatively the calling coming from the depths of the egotism ocean. The repentance makes us going ahead, and mistrusting what is within us and beneath us. The repentance doesn't let us stop even for a moment. Through repentance, God doesn't let us be content with what we have reached to be, and He constantly calls us to go further; even more than this, God doesn't let us in the egotism's darkness, but He calls us at solidarity in love." (Stăniloae 1992: 112)

"The repentance isn't an occupation only for the elderly. Of course, their repent too. But the life-creator dynamism of the repentance, the power of continuous surpassing which the repentance gives it to anybody, it shows the repentance as having a totally special purpose and a very important one to the young person. The old people repent in order to leave – detached of sins - to God, but the young repent in order to accomplish himself, in this life, as due. And the young man can accomplish himself like this only by continuously surpassing on himself. Properly-said, only thus the young man can reach his real accomplishing of all his possibilities. A young person who doesn't tend to continuous self-surpassing, a young person living a dull existence, that person is rather old than young. By definition, the youth tend towards more, towards a continuous ascension. But this continuous self-surpassing cannot be accomplished without a discontent concerning the level the young person has reached on. And it isn't enough a theoretical discontent, but there is needed a discontent intertwined with sufferance. But this means repentance." (Stăniloae 1992: 113-114)

"What is the report the permanent repentance stays in, with the repentance as Mystery? Usually, the Holy Fathers call the first repentance as repentance as such, and the second one they call it as confession. From here comes that the first one is a thorough preparation for the second one. Through the permanent repentance we prepare ourselves for the repentance as Mystery, as the repentance as Mystery must urge us to a permanent repentance. If God has given us the repentance as Mystery, it is obvious that we won't be able to go to it unprepared or only by shortly recalling our sins, recalling done in the last moment, or even during the last previous days. How many words and deeds of our, we usually forget! We will risk not remembering our thoughts, or our words, or our sinful deeds, if we do not persevere in condemning them through repentance immediately they have occurred and if we do not always remember them with regret. In the repentance as Mystery we cast out of us the garbage which we are no longer solidary with, which we have detached ourselves from, but which still is within us, even after we have detached it gradually from our soul. Presenting this burden to our spiritual guide, it is necessary to us in order us to experience even more acute the account we must give in front of God as Supreme Person Who is not identified to our inward. The Confession is necessary for us to accept the most accentuated feeling of humiliation and in order to realize that our escape from sin it depends on the help, on the support which our fellow human gives it to us, that we are supervised²²⁸ by him, that this liberation is a communion's work that exceeds the individualism which the pride stalks us from within. Through confession we place ourselves in the humble situation of disciples who receive teaching. Through confession we give the occasion to hear an objective judgment, a judgment external to our deeds, not leaning either on the slope of sparing, nor on the slope of condemning, as it happens to us almost always, when we are only us with our inside." (Stăniloae 1992: 114)

²²⁸ Father Professor Stăniloae tries to avoid using the word "judged"; in Romanian language a aviza it means to give your approval, to agree with something. Here is about being held accountable for our sins, by our spiritual guide, who decides whether we can be imparted with the Christ's body and blood, or whether we need to be

"Even if we haven't reached to a consummate inward detaching from our sinful thought, when we go to the spiritual guide, by confessing those thoughts it sets us free of them." (Stăniloae 1992: 115)

"The Holy Fathers connect the repentance to the tears. Actually, the gift of the tears it becomes plentiful on the higher levels of the spiritual life; but as the repentance being permanent it intensifies itself too on the higher levels of the spiritual life, it isn't wrong to regard the tears as being in a special bond with the repentance. The tears mustn't be absent either to the beginner repentance, though there is a great difference between the fear's tears from the beginning and the love's tears on the superior levels." (Stăniloae 1992: 115)

"The tears are the proof that the repentance has overcome the soul's callousness which has been caused by the long sinning. The tears take away with them the soaked mud after they have cleaned it up from the soul's window, and thus they open again, to the soul, the perspective towards God and towards the fellow humans, and they bring the soul out from amongst the egotism's walls of sin and petrification. The tears appear after the repentance has succeeded in pricking our heart making the heart sensitive, and after the tears has succeeded in breaking our heart and making our heart soft again, after our heart has become callous due the passion's cement soaked within our heart. The tears give our heart back its transparency, in order the human subject to become visible through it, and in order the human subject himself to be able to see the heavens through his heart. The tears wash the eyes up and make the eyes beautiful, for the tears wash up the heart and make the heart transparent, beautiful, and innocent." (Stăniloae 1992: 115)

Responsibility

“The responsibility for the neighbor, nourished out of the responsibility towards God, it is the engine giving force to the prayer and to the deed for others. This is for it keeps the man’s being dialogically connected simultaneously with God and with the fellow humans. God ties us on Him, for though Him to tie us on the others. God is the power plant where all the cables of the life current lead at, and where all these cables start from. The appeal a believer makes towards another: “Pray for me, brother (or father)!” it is the manifestation of his conscience that he simultaneously depends on God and on the neighbor, of that he depends on God through the neighbor. But it is also an appeal to the responsibility of that one before God, to a responsibility including that one’s responsibility for his fellow humans and, as such, for the one who appeal to him. Through this appeal he awakens the twofold responsibility of that person: before God and before the one who appeals him; he awakens that one to the conscience of the dialogical connection which he is with God in, and with the one who appeals him. In this sense, just the one who appeals to somebody he gives that one the possibility to wake up to the responsibility that connects him with God and with that person. The dialogue consists of the appeal of one of them and of the necessary answer of another.” (Stăniloae 1997: 221)

“The human being can get himself eased of worried, but not through a passing enthusiasm, but through eth steadfast impulse towards the brotherhood with the others, and through the hope that, by enduring the cross of the troubles and of the death, he will cross towards the resurrection in the eternal life, to the plenitude of his life in God Who has given the human being to himself, during his life in the material universe, in order to be responsible for himself and for others, on their road towards the eternal life. This is why the One Who has seeded within man the responsibility for others, for That One has done it, surely, for He values the human beings, and He has made of this responsibility a means for everybody to reach the imperishable and trouble-less life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 97)

“When the human being takes care for making of his body a means of communication with others, that it can be seen right in his body. The human being’s body itself, it becomes transparent to the man’s consciousness of being responsible in front of God, in order to be totally exceed himself, as a subject tending towards a superior and imperishable life. In such a case the body becomes a helper to the human being as existence destined to eternity and to the communication with others. But the power of this self-exceeding of the human being as subject, whom could be directed towards, or who could make it easier, if not the Subject superior to the human being? And who could uphold this power, if not the subject who can freely exceed on himself, by being aware of the fact that he will remain and that he will be strengthened in the union with the supreme Subject, himself remaining a subject? This is an exceeding towards the supreme Subject, in the human being's communication with That One and out of That One's power. Only in front of that Subject and out of His power, the human being can be responsible as subject, namely he can exceed on himself, being strengthened as subject. The man receives his strength as responsible subject, from a Subject superior to him, but Who consider the human being and Who will consider him forever as subject, granting the human subject, just by this, the responsibility due to a subject. The human being wouldn't have lived his responsibility if he hadn't been a subject in front and from the power of a supreme Subject. The human being cannot have the responsibility or the unconditional character of his responsibility, from himself or in front of himself; but neither the human being can receive it, from another human being, or from some human institution or formation, those ones as having nothing above themselves. The strength of fulfilling his responsibility, cannot be given to the human being, except by That One Who has the incontestable authority of making the human being responsible, unconditionally, and of keeping the human being, forever, in this relation with Himself." (Stăniloae 1995: 97-98)

"For God has created the people capable of answering for one another, He has also given them the word which they can manifest through, this responsibility of theirs, and which they can awaken their reciprocal responsibility through. This is one of the important purposes of the word. Having its origin in the Person-Word of God, the words used by people shows them the fact that they aren't purposeless product of the nature, and having to be again lost within nature, but they are brought to existence by a conscious superior forum that cherishes them, that makes dependent the eternally happy life on the fulfillment of their responsibility for one another, namely on their willing deeds of reciprocal help. In this is shown the great price of their existence's purpose. The human beings are created for the eternally happy life, but this depends not only of God but it also depends on the human beings and on the reciprocal help they give to one another. The human being's value is shows not only in the fact that they have been created for eternity, but also in the fact that their happy eternity depends on the reciprocal value they give to one another. Through the word which the human beings manifest their respect through, and which they manifest their responsibility through, for one another, it is shown that this reciprocal and own value that it has been given to them, in order they to know it and themselves to defend it too, each one for himself, but also for another." (Stăniloae 1995: 98-99)

"Without the supreme Subject and without the relation with Him, I would be inexplicable as subject, I would be inexplicable in my dignity as ultimate decision forum for myself. Only a supreme Subject could bring me to existence while upholding me as subject too, while upholding me as free subject too, even within Himself, as a full and fully dignified form of the existence. This is for the subject reigns upon the objects through conscience, and not inversely. But the subject is master upon himself too, in what regards his salvation or his eternal happiness. Only in front of a supreme Subject I can feel myself responsible, and I can freely accept and exercise this quality of mine. And I can be saved only in free communion with Him. And only by making me responsible, namely free factor of my own acts, He has given me the dignity of being a subject, and not an object, a subject that must contribute, at his turn, to his own salvation. The supreme Subject has made me to depend on myself, for my eternity. Only a supreme Subject, of a supreme value, could have brought me to existence as a subject of imperishable value and dignity, which make me the forum of my decisions regarding myself. Only Him could have made me a subject responsible for myself, in front of Him, and he has invested me, through this, with the greatest dignity and value, all the more as he has made to depend on this responsibility my eternal existence itself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 115)

“The human being is an existence in front of a continuous alternative. The human being isn’t moves unwillingly, on a direction or on another, but he is in the situation of the need of continuously choosing the kind of movement and its direction. This is the second thing the man knows about his existence. This is the second characteristic differing the man from animal, in addition to his conscience, always asking about himself.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 73)

“What makes the human being to choose between two possibilities it is very often not the difference between what brings him a bigger or a smaller pleasure, or between what gives him the perspective of a pleasure and of a displeasure, but it is between what is good, in a superior sense for him and for others, and that really develops him, and what depletes him, it narrows him, and it crooks his being. The first choice is helped by the responsibility naturally belonging to his conscience and that deepens his conscience, while the second one come together with the weakening of his responsibility.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 73)

“The man’s character as alternative being, it is shown by the fact that he can choose amongst deeds and, by and large, he can choose a road contrary to his responsibility or justified by a false responsibility, which drives him in a continuous lie, which he appeases his conscience with. That is a liar life, which he covers or he alters with, his reality itself - in the same time with the reality from outside. (Stăniloae 1995 I: 74)

“The man is given to himself, by the power of a supreme Person, but that is not for letting himself as he was given to himself, but in order him to develop what he has been given to be, namely his communitarian being, but also with the possibility him to work further, with the help from other and by helping others, and in the first place with the help from his Creator Who wants him living in community. The human being has been given as image of the Trinitarian supreme existence, in order him to become in the God's likeness. The human being has been created in the image of the God in Trinity in order him to develop himself in God's likeness by God's power. And this means developing him responsibility in helping others to make become likewise. The human being has been brought to existence as a created being, but also as a creator being, not in the sense of creating himself out of nothing, but in the sense of taking himself and on others further in developing the possibility which they have been given with, or, a contrary, to disorganize his own self and on others from their state as work of God, by producing thus, division between him and others." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 74)

"The human being cannot develop himself except by exercising his responsibility. And that isn't truly activated except as responsibility in front of God. The responsibility itself makes the man transparent to God. Through his responsibility the man feels himself tied to God as supreme forum. To the extent the man activates on himself as responsible being, or as real human being for people, he becomes more transparent to God and more imposing through God's authority upon him and through the authority God gives him upon others. To the extent the man exercises his responsibility more, he shows God as authority, for he becomes transparent to Him, and that authority makes the human being responsible and it accentuates his responsibility. Exercising the responsibility makes us transparent to God as authority making us responsible, not only during our life in the material body, but also as the One Who will hold us accountable, at the beginning of the eternity, for the way we have been accomplishing our responsibility during our life in the material body. The fact that the human being can become transparent to God as to the One Who will hold the human being accountable for the mode he fulfilled his responsibility, it helps the human being, anticipatedly, to fulfill his responsibility. This is for the man is aware of the fact that he is going to give the final answer about the general fulfillment of his responsibility. And the human being prays to God, while being still in his material body, to help him to give then "a good answer" on the way he fulfilled his responsibility, namely to help him fulfilling his responsibility while living in his material body, in order to be able to give "a good answer" – namely a positive answer – about that, at the final judgment." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 74)

"In the conscience of his responsibility, the human being has a new element of his self-awareness, helping him to develop his self-awareness. The responsibility asks the human being to increasingly more accomplish himself as human being. More than that, in the power which this responsibility is imposed him with, the increase awareness that he won't come to an end through the death of his body, for he will have to give account for the accomplishment of his responsibility, at the beginning of his eternal life, for the whole hi life into the material body, the human being has the certitude that that life, in its quality as good or as bad, it will depend on the mode he fulfilled or not, his responsibility during his life into the material body. A chocking of the conscience of his responsibility while living into the material body, it has as cause and as effect, the weakening of the awareness on duration, and that weakens the awareness on his responsibility. In the conscience of his responsibility, it is accentuated the knowing that he isn't alone; in the conscience about that responsibility, it shines the presence of God, and the fact that the human being will eternally stay in front of God." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 74)

"The Supreme Forum, when He created the human being, as responsible being, or as being to be held accountable for himself and for his fellow humans, he has given the human being an eternal value, namely the value of a being who can achieve his quality as eternally loving partner in his dialogue with his fellow humans and with God; God granted the man the quality as being capable of communion with Him and with the fellow humans, in eternity. The human being, through his responsibility – a responsibility asking him to take himself seriously, a responsibility that he is taken seriously through -, he is a being heading towards the eternal eschatological, and this responsibility given the human being the power of preparing himself for eternal consummation and happiness. Only out of my eternal importance in the eyes of God, for others, and out of the importance of others for me, it results the responsibility of each person for another, and also the responsibility of each person for himself, namely for his development through himself, based on his responsibility." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 75)

"In the turning of my own self towards me, I am given the responsibility for my own self, lived into conscience. We speak a lot on the responsibility of the man for another. But the human being is also responsible for himself, not only for others. Who imposes the human being this responsibility? Is this responsibility imposed to him by his own self? If this had been the case, the human being wouldn't have felt so imperatively to answer this responsibility. So, the human being is accountable to a forum superior to him, but a forum that loves the human being. The man doesn't answer his own self for the mode he takes care of his own self. The man cannot be accountable to himself for the care for himself. The human being cannot be superior to himself. The human being cannot obey himself, as inferior to himself." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 75)

“The forum Whom the human being answers for himself, He is so intimately connected to the human being’s self, so that the human being cannot think at a conscious life without this forum, and without the fact that the human being is responsible to this forum. Without such a supreme forum, there cannot exist within the human being, simply, any responsibility, namely a seriousness related to himself – this high quality of the human being. The self the human being is accountable for, it is given him by that superior forum. In the responsibility for the self, it is given the presence of God. And God is continuously present as the One Who has given and Who gives the human being the care for himself as responsibility towards Him. In this is shown the authority of God and also the importance he grants to the human being in a twofold mode: through the care for himself given to the man, and through the value God grants the human being’s existence with; let aside the fact that God Himself shows through this care for the human being, that the human being is an important existence. If God hadn’t given the man too, the care for himself, then God would have treated the human being as an object, or, at most, as a precious jewelry, but lacking any freedom - and therefore lacking any dignity.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 75)

“Thus, I, taking heed to myself, I do that while standing in front of a superior forum and on his command. This forum makes me stay turned towards myself, but by seeing Him too. This forum makes possible to me the serious awareness about me, as implying God in my existence, and it makes possible to me a live loaded with responsibility towards God. The “conscience” isn’t only my science as isolated knower subject, about me as known self, but it is also a science of mine, about myself, in front of a superior forum Who entrusted my own self to me, showing me by that, that He wants to take care of me, through myself, for He is present within me. This is a more real duality than the duality resulted out of doubting about myself. God gives me through this, also a greater power of taking care of myself. But he also gives me the honor of His cherishing the connection with me, and of His cherishing my true development.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 75)

“Sometimes the human being wants to consider himself as accountable not in the front of the conscious forum of supreme authority Whom all the things depend on in an absolute manner, but the human being wants to be accountable in front of forum from the material world, which has a relative authority: society, nation, fatherland, family, or nature. The human being can find excuses, in his conscience, for not accomplishing his responsibility, in front of each one of the enumerated elements, by denying its absolute authority. A proof in this sense it is the fact that the human being can choose one or another of them, as forum which him to answer to, or he can excuse the fact of not fulfilling his responsibility in front of one of them, by the fact of fulfilling his responsibility in front of another of them. Actually, the human being is accountable in front of all of them. But this is rather a responsibility for them than a responsibility in front of them. This is for the human being is accountable for them and in front of them, in the front of a superior forum, for he owes to do, at his turn, something for them. And this means that the human being can do something for them, or that they need a certain work from him. Thus, they too depend on man, by not having an absolute character, namely by not having the whole power within them. That's why the man must answer to a superior forum about fulfilling his duties towards them. Only God give the human being the power for truly be held accountable for them, or for their righteous thriving. Of course, the human being's thriving depends on them, but not only on them, but also on the human being, and especially it depends on God." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 76)

"Any responsibility of the man towards other reality from within the material world, it is in the same time a responsibility for that reality, in front of a superior forum Who doesn't need the human being's achievements, for His existence and consummation. The human being doesn't have a responsibility for the supreme forum, but only in front of Him." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 76)

"We accentuate the fact that in the fulfillment of the responsibility towards the social corps and institutions, it is involved the human being's responsibility for himself, as it is implied too, the responsibility for himself in fulfilling the responsibility for others. This is for his responsibility depends on the righteous life of other fellow humans of his, but also it depends on his own righteous life, besides the fact that himself advances into consummation by being accountable to those institutions and implicitly, by being liable for the people living in the frame of those institutions. But the human being's eternal existence doesn't depend on any of them, for it depends only on the absolute forum." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 76)

"The human being isn't accountable only for other, but he is accountable also for himself; neither he is accountable only for himself, but he is accountable for other too. The human being must take care not only for other, but for himself too, because if he didn't care for him in order to achieve salvation, then he wouldn't feel himself the urge for working for the salvation of his fellow humans. This care for himself it isn't a selfish one. In this care for himself it is implied the care for others too. The human being must take care of himself in order him to be consummate by taking care of others. The human being must make himself a model-source of the care for others. The human being must be accountable for himself too, in front of God, for he is God's creature, and for what he does to himself it irradiates upon others too. That's why, the human being fulfills the care for himself by taking care of others. We have to highlight here that in the responsibility for social bodies and institutions, it is shown the fact that the human being isn't accountable only for the human being he is in direct relation with, as me-you, but the human being is accountable, together with a you of his, for any him whom they know or whom they will know about. Even more, in my direct relation with you, each one of us awakens in another his responsibility for a third one, a responsibility far from criticizing or from mocking that third human being. That's why, by and large, two or more individuals speak about one or more individuals who aren't present. This shows that out of each you whom I am talking to, or out of me who am speaking to you, it speaks to me the supreme Person-forum, for them. Here is manifested our common responsibility for them. The human being is permanently and profoundly responsible, for he is permanently and profoundly asked to. And only another me can ask me to. And through that another me, I am asked by God as supreme Subject. There actually must be, in front of the won self, a supreme You or a supreme Me, sending to me, through a you or through many they, His request for those ones. Only a person can ask another person and only a person can answer that person's requests." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 77)

"This responsibility for him, I live it when I am alone. This shows that out of him too, the supreme forum speaks to me, asking me. This responsibility for a third human being, in the front of the supreme forum, I live it especially when I know him as needing my help. And I live this responsibility too, in my duty of not tempting others from around me or who know about my life, towards evil things, through the example of my life. My responsibility towards a multiplied him it is intensified to me when one or another of them is, at a certain time, a you to me, and when I know him as being in a difficult situation. And this compels me not to only waiting for those ones to haphazardly becoming a you to me, but I must search for the occasion to make him a you to me, in order to directly hear his needs and his requests. I must, therefore, visit him, run to him, when I know him as needing me, or to transmit him my love for him, through an actual you from my life. Jesus has told us that He talks to us and he asks us, especially through the person who is in a difficult situation, and that awakens our responsibility, and He has asked us to make that him a you to us, or He has asked us to make a you to us, out of as many people as possible, from the ones living in our closeness, in order us to live more intensely the responsibility towards Him too, through that human being who needs us." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 77)

"We highlight that our fellow human becomes transparent to Christ, the embodied God, when he asks us for help, especially in his helplessness, and in his hardships. Any human being is transparent to God, on one hand, through the border he sets to us, showing us that we cannot cross over him, and also that we aren't alone, and, on the other hand, through his insufficiencies, that not through him, but through God he is given to us especially into our care, and just in that is manifested God's care for remediating that human being's insufficiencies, and also the will for softening our callousness, by putting us in front of that one's hardships." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 77-78)

"The fact that the Son of God made Himself as poor, in order to awaken our responsibility, it shows us that when we encounter with one another, as human being not needing anything socially or materially, we still feel His request, through the spiritual need, maybe an unconscious one, in order to awaken within them their responsibility towards Him. Only thus we exercise our responsibility for others' salvation, and we can become, in this situation too, as transparent to God Who has made on Himself as man, towards our salvation. God works, most often, upon a human being, through another human being." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 78)

"Each human being is accountable for himself, in front of the supreme forum, for he also is accountable for other. By this, the human being lives in a threefold frame, which each member has a fully real existence within: me, you, and him. And above this transparent to God frame, the human being lives on God." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 78)

"No will can get me out of the conscience of my responsibility, except the total erasing form humanity through an accentuate superficiality. This means that nothing can totally separate me, as long as I am a human being, from the one whom I am responsible for, and from the One Whom I am responsible to. The human being can end to be alone, but that is a loneliness tormented by the helplessness of forgetting about the ones whom he does everything to forget about, or in order to put as bigger a distance as he can between him and them, through contempt and by remembering the evil they did to him, through an exaggerated egotism. The human being can try to consider his fellow human, or an institution, or a human collectivity, as a supreme Third One. But nothing on the material world's plan can remove the burden of his truly unconditional responsibility to the supreme forum, namely to God. In his real or wanted loneliness, the human being cannot escape, as least on certain moments, the feeling of the presence of God and the feeling that he has to give a certain answer to God." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 79)

"By the fact that the supreme forum has created us together with others, or by the fact that God has tied us through that, to one another, through the mediation of the request and of the responsibility, and by the fact that each human being's remaining in humanity it depends on respecting this connection, it results that each human being has an eternal value for other persons. But this means that a person is responsible for other persons he knew, even after their passing away from the present life. That's why he cannot forget them even then. So, I must pray for the persons I knew and who dies. Only by doing so, I remain myself, in a real manner, in humanity.

Only thus I keep the hope of remaining eternally and happily in humanity. In the same time with this, I must ceaselessly regret the lack of care I manifested to the person whom I was in connection with, and who passed away. Saint Barsanuphius affirmed that nobody can present himself in front of God without the ones who asked for his prayers and who asked for his useful advices for salvation, while they were living. God will ask me, for each one of my acquaintances, if I did or I didn't fulfill my responsibility for them." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 79)

"The fact that the human being feels responsible in front of a supreme forum, having to answer, in the end, if he did or didn't fulfill his duties, and, depending on that, to be given some eternal consequences, and by the fact that the human being doesn't definitively answer that during this life, it shows that the human being will have to give that answer after the end of this life, depending on how will be him found regarding the fact of having fulfilled or not, his duties; the human being, according to that, he will receive an eternal life: happy or tormented. This is the final judgment. Then it will be ascertained if they did for the other fellow humans, and therefore for himself, what he should have done and what he could have done, for his and their eternal happiness. His responsibility is so huge, for on it depends not the kind of the present passing life, but it depends on that the kind of his, and theirs: eternal live. The positive or the negative answer of each one, it will be shown, with its consequent state, worthy of happiness or of damnation, of him and of others, state which he contributed to, by fulfilling or not, his duties. That's why, each one will present himself at the final judgment together with all the ones whom he had influenced, positively or negatively. Fulfilling or not fulfilling our responsibility, it will be shown also by the fact that we were striving or not, for awakening into the ones we encountered during our life into body, their own responsibility, for themselves and of others, in front of God." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 79-80)

"From the fact that the responsibility is seeded by Creator in the human being's nature, we draw two conclusions:

a) The more the human being advances in the faith in the supreme forum, and in the conscience about the eternal value – his, and his fellow humans' -, the more he advances in overcoming his egotism that wants passing satisfactions, and the more he becomes aware of his responsibility for others and he makes greater efforts in order to fulfill the duties imposed by his responsibility, in every circumstance.

b) No human being can reckon that he has reached or that he will ever reach the consummate fulfilling of the duties of his responsibility, but the mankind is called towards that end. The humanity must have reached this end in a concrete accomplishment of itself, through God. That's why the hypostasis of the Son of God has made Himself man, for in Him the humanity to consummately fulfill its responsibility, and in order to show that to all of us, through the example of His life and through His total and most-clean self-sacrifice, for us, in front of God. Only in union with Christ, the people can ascend on the level of a as tight as possible fulfillment of their duties. Without this fulfillment, by the Son of God made man, of the full human responsibility, and with that fulfillment's help and in union with it, the fulfillment of the entire human responsibility by and large, the conscience about this unconditional responsibility and of its need for consummate fulfillment, it would have been contrary to the human nature and it wouldn't have been a mistake to disregard it." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 80)

Resting

“The man doesn’t feel himself “at home” while being alone, even if he is in the edifice where he has been inhabiting for a long time. His “home” is where his beloved being or beings are, it is the place of together-living of the ones forming a spiritual family. Finding his “house” again, or finding again the beloved beings, the spiritual family, it gives him an infinite or undefined sentiment of resting. This is one of the structures of an experience which doesn’t lose its infinity or indefinite.” (Stăniloae 1992: 301)

Restoration

“The saint, through his self-giving to god, through his communion with God, and through God with all the people, in a manner free of any hidden thought or interest, he fully restores his humanity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 278-279)

“The people were fallen in a weakness preserved by their will too – because it is difficult to distinguish between the human nature’s weakness and the will’s agreement with the weakness – it was necessary His Ghost to work upon them, out of the hearth of the creator and restorer Word. This was necessary in order to get the people off the weakness of the fallen human nature, which brought also a weakness of the will, or an agreement of the will with the sin of separation from God, and to elevate the people in a full communion with the Son of God has become man, or Who has become fully restored image of God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 165)

“(…) the good God helped us composing also a synthesis of Orthodox Dogmatic Theology. This is not a reproduction of the former studies, but it is thought anew and as a whole (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 5)

“For the nature’s restoration to its normal state, namely in the communion state, it was a death which to shake the earth and the heavens to the ground, for a universal spiritual earthquake to be the beginning of a new form of existence of the creature who derailed from its path. Instead of destroying the disfigured creation (or of letting it to disorganize and to become totally exhausted), God preferred this death which supra- equated through the earthquake produced by it, an echo of the universal death abyss. The death of the creation was substituted for the death of the One Who comprised in summary the whole created world, by giving to this death a more shaking echo than the death can give it to the world.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Resurrection

“By achieving the unity or simplicity in God, the composition of the creature overcomes the force of the decomposition, of the corruptibility. Thus, through the Resurrection of Christ, the bodies achieve the incorruptibility (the lack of rottenness). The corruptibility is overwhelmed by the unitary force of the spirit.” (Stăniloae 2003: 176)

“The full victory of the divine spiritual power upon nature, it has been accomplished in the Resurrection of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 233)

“This love that crossed through the supreme sacrifice, it has been the spiritual “power” that resurrected Christ, or that has overcome the thickened laws of the nature. And this “power” will resurrect us too (1 Cor. 15: 43). By the fact that it is the fruit of the love and the accomplished image of the full love, the state of Resurrection is the true life. “We will be alive with him by His power towards us” (2 Cor. 13: 4). It is wonderful the power of God that is irradiated within creation: but this power would remain ambiguous and lacking a meaning if it remains eternally submitted to the insufficiencies which presently press upon it. The power of God is shown infinitely greater and full of meaning, through Resurrection. God will fill up this world with his uncreated glory when he will endow the world with the immortality and he will make the world a transparent environment of His endless depth of life and meanings.” (Stăniloae 2003: 234)

“Jesus Christ has been having until today and He still has a great influence upon the life of the creation. Is this influence due to the real work of Christ, or is it the product of a subjective exaggeration that has been perpetuated in the history of the Christendom? First, one can say this thing: this influence isn’t the gradual product of a fantasy developed in time, but it was felt even from the immediate witnesses of His Resurrection. The witness on His Resurrection didn’t crystallize gradually. The forms of this witness can be found down to a time which is not so much far away from His death. Out of the communion of faith the authors of the Gospels are in with the resurrected Lord, they describe His Person in a form in some measure free. Everything is said in the New Testament about Christ it is imprinted by His efficiency upon the authors, an efficiency differing from that of any other personality who was only a man. They didn’t confess about the resurrection and about the Person of Jesus Christ only as about two things corresponding to each other; the disciples spoke about these things as people who were, on the moment they were writing in, under His efficiency. The Resurrection of Christ is certified by His objective efficiency that started immediately upon His disciples and it was prolonged upon them and upon the disciples of these disciples, in order to continue as efficiency during the whole Christendom’s history. Christ hasn’t resurrected without making Himself known in a real manner as such, and objectively without founding their conviction that He is persisting in connection with the ones who believe in Him, to the end of the time. "The whole Tradition about Christ it has sprung out of the faith in His resurrection, and it has been concentrated on the relation me-You with the Crucified Who is alive even now". And the witness about the Resurrection of Christ couldn't be the product of a logical deduction out of His life, or the product of a subjective fantasy stimulated by the sentimental connection with Him of the ones who live around Him. The faith in God or the sentimental connection with the Master Who didn't die, it didn't ever lead by itself to the faith in His resurrection, a resurrection which to be the basis of everybody's resurrection. The helplessness of the natural judgment to admit the Resurrection of Christ, if this one hadn't happened as an incontestable fact, it would have led, on the opposite, to the doubt concerning His godhead, or, out of the faith of His godhead they wouldn't have deduced His Resurrection. And this helplessness of judging, it would have stopped also the work of the disciples' fantasy, despite the whole sentimental attachment to Him. The character of the Person of Jesus, no matter how exceptional had been, it wouldn't have convinced the disciples, aprioristically, that He must resurrect. This was proven by their fleeing away during the His trial and passions, and the doubt they manifested each time Christ foretold them about those, even while, on the other hand, they were confessing about His godhead (Mt. 16: 16). (Stăniloae 2006: 10-11)

"(...) the Resurrection the disciples witnessed about, it wasn't the resurrection of whomsoever man, but it is just that of Christ Who imposed Himself to them as a person with a power, with a life, and with a teaching which exceeded any power, any life, and any teaching from within the limits of the human existence. It was the resurrection of a person Who gave Himself to them as being the Son of God, without manifesting any proud for that – for it was a real fact – and Who foretold His Resurrection. Letting aside the fact that the Resurrection of Christ couldn't have been an event happened with an average man, the experience of the Resurrection itself opened to the disciples the full access to the real "historical" Christ, or it assures us about the "historical" existence of Christ as God-Man." (Stăniloae 2006: 11)

"(...) the experience of the disciples regarding Christ, it receives its fullness only by experiencing His Resurrection, as experiencing the "historical" Christ, next to Who they spent several years, but Who they didn't fully understand previously to His Resurrection. "Accentuating the ascended Lord, it isn't therefore a getting far from the life of Jesus, lived by Him as man. A contrary, the ascended Lord is not a phantom only in that case that He isn't other but Jesus from the time interval between His birth and His death". That's why the Apostles gave themselves not only as witnesses of the Resurrection of Christ, but also as the witnesses who stood next to Him the whole time from the beginning of His activity (Acts 1: 21). Thus, Jesus, as seen in the New Testament, with the eyes of the ones who were the witnesses of His Resurrection and partakers to a communion with the resurrected and ascended Lord, He isn't else but the historical Jesus, seen, after His resurrection, in the fullness of His light." (Stăniloae 2006: 11)

"The ones who wanted to eliminate everything that exceeds in Christ the exclusive human, they weren't succeeded in reconstituting the sure image of the historical Christ in the purely human meaning of the word. They weren't able to do that due to the fact they didn't find help in other sources, through which, according to their method, the must have found their refusal of what that method considered as necessary to be eliminated, because of not being strictly human, from the image of Jesus from the New Testament, and also because of the fact that the disciples themselves weren't able to frame in a strictly human contour the Person of their Teacher, either before His Resurrection, because even then, He remained them a being beyond any human measures, despite the whole His supreme human closeness with them. They needed the key of the Resurrection even for being able to complete, to fully understand and to fully formulate this godlike character of their Teacher Who appeared to them even before the Resurrection as exceeding what fitted the strictly human measures." (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

"The question is: must we reject the witness of the Resurrection, or must we receive it with mistrust, or must we consider it as insufficient, for the reason of being, in the same time, the witness of some people who didn't stubbornly close themselves to the experience of the Resurrection, but they accepted it, by obeying themselves under the force of the reality, and therefore with the "faith" in that event?" (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

"The purpose itself, of the Resurrection, it consists in the Resurrection's efficiency upon the historical humanity." (Stăniloae 2006: 69)

"The Father, from Who proceeds the Holy Ghost - but the Holy Ghost is within the Son too - when spiritualizing the Lord's body, the Father spiritualizes it with the Holy Ghost. But when the Ghost is active, Christ cannot be an object, but He too is in activity. This common act of supreme spiritualizing the body, it was done in the supreme communion amongst the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit. Only due to this spiritualization, out of the Son's body the Ghost will be irradiating within the world; the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and, through Christ as man, the Ghost will be sent in the world. This is for Christ isn't passive in this irradiation of the Ghost through Christ's body." (Stăniloae 2006: 69-70)

"If Christ didn't endure as being an object, the Resurrection, but He was a together-subject, with the Father, of the Resurrection, it follows that Himself has overcome or He participated to overcoming the death, by exercising His power as Emperor in this act, namely not only as God but also as man.

Besides, only by recognizing this we maintain the hypostatical union in the whole its reality, with the implications resulting from it upon the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 70)

“According to the Holy Fathers’ teaching, Christ deified His body while He was still living on earth, by filling up His body with power and through His efforts to maintain, on Himself, clean. During His death the body couldn’t be emptied of this godhead. It is the Church’s teaching that the godhead wasn’t separated even during His death, either from His soul or from His body. Christ’s Resurrection it wasn’t therefore only the result of a decree of the Father, but it was prepared also by this union of Christ’s humanity with His godhead, through His godlike Hypostasis Who was wearing the human nature too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 70)

“As such, the resurrected body of Christ it is not only a guarantee the Father has given us, that we can also be resurrected, but it is also a source of godlike life for us, during our earthly life, a source of power and of cleanness. It is a source of power, and of spiritualization, in order to maintain and to increase ourselves in cleanness, and in the spiritualization that leads us to resurrection. To this spiritualization it relates the progress, in a transparency that, by being a continuous strengthening and a continuous becoming as person, of our person, it is in the same time a strengthening of the communion with God, and amongst us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 70)

“Since His apparitions, Christ irradiates out of His body this power and this glory, or he makes Himself known in such a luminous transparency, which mostly of the time, it overwhelms His body, and He makes His body visible only when He wants, but even then, His body is lighted by His imposing power as Person. About the effect this resurrected body is having upon us, we are told by all the Holy Fathers and by the Orthodox Church’s songs. “Christ has resurrected, let’s clean up our feelings”, says a churchly song. Saint Cyril of Alexandria said: “For Christ has resurrected, by trampling on the death, in order to deliver us too from corruption and, by stopping the weeping because of it, to assure us to shout out full of joy: “You have turned my crying into joy, you have torn apart my sackcloth and you have dressed me up in joy” (Ps. 29: 11)²²⁹.” (Stăniloae 2006: 70)

“The fact that Christ hasn’t been resurrected like an object, from a death that would have brought Him to a total helplessness, it is shown by the Holy Fathers also in the fact that Christ manifested His power even before resurrecting with the body, in breaking the hell’s gates and in liberating from there the ones who hoped even before Christ’s coming. He has defeated the hell with His human soul, but a soul was united with the godhead. Because of this, He is the first soul that couldn't be held in hell, but He escapes the hell, and by irradiating His godlike power he liberates from hell also the souls of the ones who believed the promises, even before His coming into body. (...) The Person of the Word, entered through a soul in unmediated relation with those souls, He maintained those souls in this relation, and therefore in the Paradise he has founded by this, for those souls, and for all the ones who will die in Him." (Stăniloae 2006: 70)

²²⁹ In KJB we have Ps. 30: 11.

"Out of the Christ's fully deified soul, or out of His fully spiritualized soul, it irradiated then the power which will resurrect or which will spiritualize also His body from tomb. That's why the resurrection starts in hell. This is explicitly told us in the Epistle I Pt. 4: 6." (Stăniloae 2006: 71)

"The Holy Scripture and the Holy Fathers affirm that the Resurrected Christ irradiated out of Him, to the ones who see Him, much more than a surety that He is God (...). Christ irradiates out of Himself the light and the power of the Ghost, filling too the ones who see Him, with this Ghost. The people who see Christ receive the conviction that He is God through the Ghost they are communicated with, Who, after spiritualized Christ's body, he fills up the people too, with power. And this power continues to be communicated after Ascent too and this power will gradually spiritualize our bodies, bringing our bodied towards Resurrection, through our irradiation from within Him inside us (Rom. 8: 9-11)." (Stăniloae 2006: 72)

"The power from the resurrected body of the Lord, it continues to be communicated both to His disciples and to all the ones who believe in Him after Christ's Ascent with His body to heavens. This power was communicated to them, at the beginning, by the Descent of the Holy Ghost and then in the Church's Mysteries. "He has made you alive together with me", said Saint Apostle Paul (Col. 2: 12). "Christ is our life (Col. 3: 4). "Walk into Him, by being rooted and built up into Him... And into Him dwells, bodily, the whole fullness of the godhead" (Col. 2: 6, 7, 9)." (Stăniloae 2006: 72-73)

"We aren't given from the beginning everything that is in Christ, and there is necessary our own effort in order to assimilate increasingly more of what Christ is, namely assimilating increasingly more of His humanity. "And all of us, with our uncovered face reflecting like a mirror, the glory of the Lord, we are being transformed in the same likeness from glory to glory as it is from the Lord, Who is the Ghost (II Cor. 3: 18). In the Resurrected Christ there is the godlike life for in Him is the man's death too, taken in Himself, and both the life and the death are active within us. "We always carry into body the death of Christ, for His life to be shown too, within our bodies" (II Cor. 4: 10). Out of the death's power, but also out of His Resurrection's power, we die to the sin and we become alive to God. "And if Christ dwells within you, your body is dead to the sin... And if the Ghost of the One Who has resurrected from dead, (therefore being also the Ghost of Christ, o. n.), He dwells within you... He will make your bodies alive" (Rom. 8: 10-11). We can find many of such places in the Holy Scripture. Their content was explained, in many ways, by the Holy Fathers. This content can be summarized thus: the body of the Resurrected Christ is a body elevated to the full spiritual transparency and in this quality His body has been filled up with holiness, with deification, being such in front of the Father. But this holiness, transparency and deification, are transmitted to us too, through the impartation with His body, and so, Christ's Resurrection means not only His communion with the Father, but also His entering in full communion with us, communion that is virtual to us in the beginning, but it follows to become an actualized communion, by the dwelling of Christ and of the Holy Ghost within our being." (Stăniloae 2006: 73)

"Only the perspective of the resurrection gives us the power to wage the true fight required by it: the fight against passions, the fight for sensitization, for communion, for likeness to Christ and this is the power of the One Who has resurrected, a power that upholds us on this road." (Stăniloae 2006: 76)

"The resurrection with the body of the human individual person it cannot take place but in solidarity with the transformation of the whole substance of the cosmos, namely at the end of the present form of the world. Christ alone has resurrected, in order to place in front of us the perspective and the hope of the resurrection and in order Him to become the source of the transfiguration power of the present cosmos and of our bodies' resurrection. The resurrected Christ is through Himself the beginning and the prophet of the end of the world's present life and of the world's elevation in the plenitude of the life on God." (Stăniloae 1997: 237-238)

"Elevating the life of the individual person in the plenitude of the life of God it is solidary, in the same time, with elevating all the people to this life. And this is not only because of the resurrection with the body cannot be obtained separately from the transformation of the world, and from the everybody's resurrection, but also because of the fact that the history as work of the entire mankind it is important for the good or the bad actualization of the entire human nature and it has the purpose of making the whole world transparent to the divine rationalities from within the world, through everything the mankind does good within the world's frame, or to make the world opaque because of what the mankind does evil." (Stăniloae 1997: 238)

"The fact itself that the mankind is destined to resurrection, the basis of which it has been laid by Christ, namely to the resurrection in solidarity, on a plan of absolute and eternally happy life, it shows that God has prepared for the mankind something much higher, and the history of the creation is only a stage of human existence which the mankind to contribute to its growth in, for this absolutely happy life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 260)

“If today the differences of nature can, largely, cover the moral differences, so that you cannot know out of the people’s countenances their moral states and so the moral states lose some importance, after resurrection these state will be reflected in such a measure in their countenances, than the exterior will be overwhelmed by the interior, very deep and very nuanced, spirituality; this will make the people to see themselves with their whole interior expresses externally; there won’t be possible or wanted any equivocal or dissimulation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 284)

“Before everything, the resurrection of Christ founds, by and large, our belief into a continuation of the life after death. “(1 Co. 15: 17) And if Christ be not resurrected, your faith is vain”, said Apostle Paul. Without this event we could not found at the people who lived in history any proof of the life after death; we could have said that Jesus, by dyeing, He definitively ceased to exist and any man through death he perishes in an integral way. If this belief hadn’t been founded through His resurrection, it wouldn’t have had any importance the difference between the ones who believe and the ones who don’t, and it wouldn’t have been anymore any proof that Jesus was God, and His work, it was a savior work.

But, obviously, supposing that the resurrection of the Lord has this purpose of being a basis, we are going to develop, other significations of it.

The modern considerations, which are brought in favor of the soul’s immortality, they see in the separation of the soul from the body a liberation of his enchained powers, a burst into a fuller life. The Christian, based on the revealed teaching and upheld by the indication of some experiences, he believes that the souls will be partakers to such amplification of the life, by leaving from here without being surrounded by sin. The first one Who passed through death to a fuller life was Jesus Christ.

The sin, therefore, is a more durable impediment on the way of the spiritual life, than the body is. The sin remains permanently tied on the soul, like a disfiguration of his being. The body might not affect the powers of the spirit in their being, and it might only be a barrier in manifestation. The sin deforms and it weakens them to their heart. This truth is illustrated by the two forms of existence of the souls after death, because, though all the souls leave their bodies, not all of them go into a tormented existence like it would have been if the body had altered their being, or into a happy existence, as it would have been the case if, besides body like a passing barrier of the soul, there hadn’t been anything else to blunts the soul in a more durable way. But, a real separation between body and sin, in order to be possible to ascertain what can be actually done or what can be attributed to one or another, it doesn’t take place but only after the separation of the soul by the body. In the earthly life the body and the sin are like an undivided whole, so that is harder to really highlight that the impediment of the spiritual life it isn't the body, but it is the sin. According to the Christian teaching, the man, ever since the first moment of his apparition in body, in the earthly life, he is burdened with the hereditary sin.

Not the born body is the sin; between them it can be made, in the light of the existence of the souls in the future life, a conceptual distinction. But the sin appears together with the apparition of the man into body, namely on the first moment of his existence. The earthly existence of the man, the first form of his existence, it is born with the seal of the sin and this fact is recognized in all his life's unfolding. But the body is the seen form of this existence. Even if through the baptism in Jesus Christ, the man is removed from under the slavery of the sin, he still remains, while on earth, into a body of which report towards the soul are determined by the general law of the earthly existence of the people, after the apparition of the sin into world. The body, after the ancestral sin, it has become an instrument of the sin, not only because the sin, like an act of the subject, it is done through him, but also because through him it encircles the soul even more in the development of its power. This ingrate service is fulfilled by the body after a thickening, after its structuring in this sense. Even when, from inside a man the sin has vanished, this structural thickening of the body remains, being also a condition of the man's engaging in the form of this world, determined by sin." (Stăniloae 1993)

"This resurrection cannot take place though before the transformation of the entire face of this world, which is affected by sin and thickened on the measure of the conviction of the people driven by the passions.

In the present form of the world, it is impossible, for instance, not to exist death, so it is not possible an endless life, a life full of resurrection to the people who live according to its laws. The younger generations will be able to find food, only if the older generations die. On one hand, it is a divine commandment that people to use the sexual instinct for procreation, and on the other hand, if the people keep multiplying without death, the earth won't be able not feed them." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The nature's getting out of the passions' writhing, by being the sign of a strengthening and by having as consequence a strengthening, it is the beginning of experiencing that incorruptibility brought By Jesus Christ to the human nature, it is the earnest of the resurrection." (Stăniloae 1992: 156)

"While it is characteristic to the subject to not be used by somebody until dissolving him in death, the supreme power as subject the man receives it into Christ, by the fact that He makes Himself man's own subject, namely not stranger to the man; the hypostatical Logos, or the divine Subject, He makes Himself man's subject. The Man Jesus endured death for He wanted to endure it, and not unwillingly. All of us endure a limitation, as a multi-diverse cross, until the total cross of the death. This makes of man, in a certain measure, an object. But the man is called to make of the cross given to him, in the same time, a gate towards the infinity of God. And the man can do this by fully accepting to surrender himself to God, by willingly and fully accepting God as the man's border. The one reckoning that he finds the infinity inside his limit, he ends up inside the limit. BY reckoning that he will find the infinity (namely he will be like God), by eating out of the apparently exuberant tree but actually finite tree of the world, the man ended up in his limited situation, namely in death. Christ accepted the limit as a willing surrender to God, and He entered the Paradise through death, namely through the harsh wood of the cross. Christ defeats the death by His own power, by accepting the cross as total surrender, namely from the full position as Subject. Even when it seemed that Christ was made totally object through death, He defeats the death by receiving it as Subject, by accomplishing, in a culminant mode, the act of total surrender to the Father, as an act of an undefeated Subject. But he did that as man. Thus, the human face of Jesus, the most intense expression of the human subject, it will no longer definitively shut, as any human face from before Him. And Him, out of His power as fully restored human subject, He received the power of resurrection for eternity, namely for defeating the death, of being as subject in eternity." (Stăniloae 2005: 172)

"By no longer knowing about connection with God, as existence differing from the world, the man falls under the fear of the death, as definitive end of the whole man and, by that, the man no longer sees any meaning of the existence, the man sees no light in his existence, or he sees his existence as absurd. It seems to him that this way of thinking is rational or scientific, but it actually cannot be like that, because it is impossible that the whole existence to lack any meaning or any light. Such a conception would be the result of an exclusive trust in some blind laws, some strictly material laws of the existence. That's why, on the other hand, the man cogitates that the death cannot be understood as such, and therefore the man waits for a way of getting rid of death, as exclusive destruction of the body, a way that to leave the soul in existence and with the possibility that the man to be restored as whole again." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 161)

"It is rational to cogitate the love of the Creator, as being so great that it doesn't leave the people in the state of separation and without employing another work of His great love for the people, namely the greatest and the most efficient use of His love. This work consists of making the most love Person of the Trinity, as man Who, by maintain His quality as Son, He also love as man, with the love of the son, on God-the Father, and Who communicates to the people too, this maximum love of His. On this purpose Christ went so far in proving His love for people, as God, and in proving His love for the Father, as man, so that He receives even death for people, in order to defeat the death through His resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 161-162)

“The defeat of the death, done by the Son of God for the people, it won’t have a happy effect upon the people if they do not admit, through their free faith, that Christ has done that. This is, on one hand, full of meaning for existence, and on the other hand it is a great mystery exceeding everything that happens through the blind laws usually noticed by people in their existence. Only by admitting a supreme existence Who loves us, and only by answering His love with our love, we can benefit of the defeat upon death offered us by Christ for our eternal happiness. Without this faith one only obtains a resurrection towards the eternal unhappiness, for God doesn’t want the created human being to disappear or to remain incomplete. By this God shows the value He grants to the human creatures.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 163-164)

“The Son of God has removed, through His birth as man out of Virgin, the rigid law brought by sin, and through resurrection He has elevated Himself above death, the death being another form of the rigid law of the body’s matter, in the life after His resurrection, and after our resurrection, He fully elevates us to the freedom from the matter’s laws, from under their slavery.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 100)

“Without the resurrection of Christ, without the transformation of His body in a fully spiritualized body, it would have been baseless also the spiritualized life for the other people, after the general resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 106)

“What Saint Paul affirmed that the universe, through the resurrection of Christ, will fully escape corruption, being shown the man’s glory in his power of freely using the universe, the man being at his turn escaped from corruption, it was affirmed by Saint Maximos too, who explained this in another mode. He completed the explanation of the world’s and of the man’s crossing, through the Christ’s resurrection, from corruption to glory and to the man’s freedom, by analyzing the theme of the connection between pleasure and pain.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 106)

“Christ, as the new Adam, he has brought the light of His resurrection through the cross’s supreme act of love, and this prepares us for the happy life of our resurrection in communion with Him and for the life through receiving His Holy and life-Maker Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 121)

“Through the body of Christ it irradiates, unimpeded, the power of God, leading to resurrection on all the ones who are imparted with Christ’s body, and even leading the whole Creation to incorruptibility and to transparence.

Such a state means a victory of the human being upon himself and upon nature, a victory of the human being's community with the divine Person, a liberated human creature who can willingly endure the death – the supreme tyranny of the enslaved nature! We will see God “face to face”, but we will see “face to face” also on one another, no longer covered by the nature manifested in personal needs, in bodily weaknesses, in illnesses, or in all sorts of passions. The body won't cease to exist, but it will be a transparent body, so that we will see through it, in an unmediated manner, on God into glory, for everything will be totally spiritualized, beyond being divided in subjective and objective, beyond the nature's chains, beyond the passionate struggle for mastering the nature, beyond each one's fight for defending himself against others. Only the resurrection will open us the perspective from the nature's fatality leading to death, by opening us a plan worthy of us and of our aspirations, and, with that, the perspective of an ever-deeper sensitiveness and delicacy. Only the resurrection will escape us from wrongly fighting for obtaining an ephemeral existence, with the cost of taking advantage of others, with the cost of some imaginary experiences of self-accomplishment through pleasures. Only the perspective of the resurrection opens us the miracle of the happiness of fighting the passions, of the fight for getting more sensitive, of the fight for transparency, for communion, for likeness to Christ, the power of the One Who has resurrected upholding us on this path.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 137-138)

“The resurrection of Christ is the event that give the history meaning and light and, by that, it gives meaning and light to our life too. Without the resurrection of Christ, the history would have been locked up in a monotony and in a total meaningless, like all the components of the world and of the human persons.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 139)

“If everything we do had lacked the consequences, what would have us forced ourselves to do anything? Only the perspective of our eternity gives our life importance. And this perspective has been opened by the resurrection of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 140)

“The resurrection of Christ has brought upon us and upon the whole world, the full light and the integral meaning. Before Christ's resurrection the people didn't know for sure what they were living for, neither what the world existed for. Everything was covered in darkness. Some people suspected that they would have after their death an eternal life, but they weren't sure about that. Now we know that about our life into body, we will have also an eternal, either happy or unhappy, life, according to what we have used this world like, namely either for knowing the glory of God and for proving our love for one another, or in order to satisfy our egotistic, perishable, and mortal pleasures, pleasures which become boring after a while.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 140)

“Jesus didn’t resurrect only for Himself - with His body which He assumed as God – but he resurrected in order to give us too, through His resurrected body, the power of resurrecting at our turn. “By resurrecting Jesus from His tomb, He has given us the eternal life” (Resurrection’s Katabases).” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 140)

“The resurrection is the celebration of the greatest joy, of a joy able to accompany us during our whole life, to the extent of our faith into the resurrected Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 140)

“The resurrection of Christ gives us this light and this joy, not only through what it means, but also by the certitude that it took place. The other religions give some ideas about the good promised by them after death. The resurrection of Christ gives us the surety about our resurrection and about our eternal happiness, for is it a fact shown into history, even though not produced by some factors, characteristic to this world or to the history. Christ live into history, He received death into history, and He resurrected into history, in order to show that He exceeded the history through His power from above and outside the history, a power He manifested within history, a power made obvious also through the target He has showed us beyond history. And through this target He has given history a meaning and a value, and He has made the history as path towards eternity.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 140-141)

“The resurrected Christ showed Himself to His Apostles, whom He lived together into history with, and whom He spoke to, and in front of whom He worked His wonderful deeds, for three years. And the Apostles knew that the resurrected One is Christ Himself and they bore witness, even paying with their lives, their conviction that their Teacher Himself resurrected, and they gained the world with the power of their witness. And they proved that they didn’t do that by manifesting a lack of criticism, but after the ran away from Him, in fear, when he was taken to His death, because they doubted His power to resurrect. The High Priests and the Pharisees, when they saw that the empty tomb is contrary to their belief, they affirmed – impossible to uphold such an affirmation – that His Apostles came and stole His body while the soldiers guarding the tomb were asleep.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 141)

“The resurrection of Christ was proven as a sure fact, the only sure fact, which proves, at its turn that, beyond the meaningless reality, full of misery, and mastered by death, of this world - when the world is reckoned as being itself the sole reality, a reality inexplicable through the world itself, due to its dependent and imperfect character - there is the superior and consummate reality of the Almighty and loving of people God. The history of a world locked up in itself it is meaningless, either during infinitely or not.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 142-143)

“The resurrected Christ has given the human life and the world a meaning, by bringing light and transparency within them, a fact required by the true rationality. Christ went through history towards resurrection, and that shows us that the history is to us too, such a path, that the history is a path towards eternity. The resurrection of Christ is a unique fact into history. The resurrection of Christ demonstrates His godhead. This is for, though some persons resurrected too – according to the Gospels -, they resurrected by His power, while He was alive, and the resurrected people, by turning back to their previous life, they didn’t bring any exceeding of the history. Christ only, has resurrected by Himself, after He died, and that showed that he didn’t die wholly, but He kept a power that was above the life into body. And only Him showed Himself as bearing a body superior to the historical body. This shows Him as truly being God, and that He came into history, through His embodiment, in order to exceed the history.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 143)

“Christ manifests a more obvious godlike power, by resurrecting His own body from tomb, after He dies, than when resurrecting Lazarus through the power of His body, or than resurrecting the son of the widow from Nain. In those cases, He was alive with His body, manifesting, through the power of His body, the act of resurrecting those people, whilst, in His resurrection, He manifested in an obvious mode, a power from beyond His body.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 143-144)

“Lazarus and the son of the widow from Nain are resurrected from death but still to the life into historical body. In those cases, the resurrection didn’t open eternal perspectives to the resurrected ones. So, through those resurrections, Christ didn’t show Himself as crossing the people from history to a live beyond the history. But through His own resurrection, Christ showed Himself as more powerful than the history, and he showed Himself as able to give us too, a new live than our live into history, and therefore to makes us after too, unsubmitted to the history.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 144)

“The resurrection of Christ done by Himself after His death, and His apparitions with another body, a body renewed relatedly to the historical body, but the same like, it shows us an act that cannot be done by any power of the body, but it can be done only by a power from beyond the historical state, it shows us the obvious elevating to a life superior to the historical life, to a life on another plan, to an eternal life, and it shows us that such a life exists. The godlike power manifested into the resurrection of Christ, it proves us the others’ resurrections as being true as well, as also all the wonders worked by Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 144)

“Without Christ’s resurrection would have seemed that everything had been mastered by the meaningless tragedy of the definitive death. All the man’s egotistic passions and all his generous efforts would have seemed as meaningless.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 144-145)

“The resurrection of Christ has removed the death’s darkness through the light of the live that follows the death. That’s why, as Christians, we light up the candle when our fellow humans are about to die. That one won’t go to nothingness, but he is about to go to an eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 145)

“Christ’s resurrection wasn’t a bringing back of His body to the state from before His death, for, if that had been the case, His body would have been submitted again to corruption (rottenness) and death. It wasn’t also the forming of a body that to be totally stranger to the body from before death. It actually was a re-bringing to life of His body from before His death, but as spiritualized at maximum, consummately penetrated by the harmony and by the communicability of the spirit united with God. The body of Christ kept the traces of the spikes. Through His body it could be seen the life of His soul, as imprinted by His generous and savior thought and deeds, borne by the extremely luminous His divine Hypostasis. The Apostles recognized, in the body of the resurrected Christ, His body from before death, but as elevated to the most luminous glory, transparency, and spiritual beauty.” (Stăniloae 1995: 197)

“Due to Christ’s spiritualized state, His body after His resurrection, it was a body totally transparent to His soul and to his godhead, and therefore, the ones who saw Him, they realized the presence of the godhead within His body. It was a body liberated from any dependency on the conditions of the living in the material universe. His body was fully participating to the life of the Person-Absolute. It was, by that, a body illuminated by the glory of the Absolute. It was a body of the consummate freedom, and transparent for the rationality, for the understanding, and for the clean thought, in an unshadowing manner. Through that body wasn’t seen except the light. Namely, Christ resurrected with a body no longer submitted to the necessities common with the animal necessities, but still preserving His personal traits and everything which His body was imprinted with, through His deeds and thought, during His life in the material universe with the material body. This is the glory seen by Apostle Paul, when he said: “We are waiting as Savior, on Jesus Christ Who will transform the countenance of our body according to the countenance of the body of His glory” (Phil. 3: 20). It is the same glory which the resurrected body of the Savior has been clothed in, for His body is so much overwhelmed by the Ghost, so that one can say that the resurrected Christ is the Ghost. And this means that Christ’s body had a consummate freedom. Saint Apostle Paul said that through the words: "The Lord is Ghost. And where the Ghost of the Lord is, there is the freedom. And all of us, by looking as in a mirror, with the unveiled face, the glory of the Lord, we are transformed in the same image, from glory to glory, as at the Ghost of the Lord" (II Cor. 3:18)." (Stăniloae 1995: 198)

"Our resurrected body will be in the state which the body was created towards, by being elevated to the full participation to Absolute, through the body's "passing" to the totally free life of the Absolute, passing called by Jews as "Passover". The resurrection of Christ is His "Passover" and the foundation of the "Passover" of all of us." (Stăniloae 1995: 198)

"About the spiritual character – and therefore full of glory or of light – of the resurrected body of Christ, Saint Apostle Paul declared that: "It was made the first man, Adam, with a living soul, and the last Adam (Christ) with life-giver Ghost". That's why our body too: "it resembles in corruption, and it resurrects in incorruptibility; it resembles into dishonor, and it resurrects into glory... It is sown natural body, and it resurrects spiritual body" (I Cor. 15: 45)." (Stăniloae 1995: 198)

"God has placed the human nature in an eternal movement which, after the separation of the soul from the body, it makes those two as ever-tending to reunite. God's contribution to the resurrection of the dead ones it is, in the first place, that of not opposing Himself to the soul's tendency to reunite with the body." (Stăniloae 1995: 199)

"In the Christian conception, the human beings, once fallen into the ancestral sin, they are no longer able to liberate themselves from the body's death. The role of Christ, the embodied Son of God, it is indispensable on this purpose, because the human being is incapable of entering through himself, in the fullest connection with God, connection understood as communication too, without this communication to start from God. And the resurrection depends of this. If the ones who passed away, were petrified in evil, they won't be turned towards good, not even by Christ, - even if they will resurrect too -, the others will reach the definitive resurrection into happiness. In both cases, the human being will have reached to a stopping of the movement. The first ones stop in the happy resting. This is for the humanity framed in the Christ's Hypostasis, it is in a consummate communication with the eternally unchangeable godhead, out of whom this stability in resurrection it will be communicated to the human beings too, if they will have been united themselves with Christ, through faith. The sweetness of the consummate union with Christ it will be so great in their state of resurrection, that their movement will come to a halt in an eternal communicative resting, into Christ and with the resurrected Christ. This is an idea firstly clarified by Saint Maximos the Confessor. Only by assuming the human nature in the Word's Hypostasis, by being framed in this supreme bosom of perfect love of the existence, it assures the ones who want that, against the definitive death or against some endless reincarnations, caused by eternal discontents. The human being can easily unite themselves with the Son of God Who entered the possibility of the eternal communication with the people, through the humanity assumed by Him, and through the limitless love he is communicating them through His humanity. By That, Christ keeps the human beings steadfastly in the maximum happiness of the resting into Him, so that they no longer want a further movement, a movement that can change from good to bad, due to the illusion of being good. Int this eternally communicative and in this continuous increasing into Him, Christ keeps us not only by the fact that He is God, infinite in the life-giver power of His resurrection, but also by the fact that He is Person and not an essence, as in Platonism or in Origenism, an essence that is incapable of a conscious love. Christ is godlike Person, inexhaustible in the endless love He shows us. To this, it is added the fact that This Person is in the same time man, showing us, in His limitless love capable of other and other manifestations, a human intimacy and understanding, beyond which we no longer feel the need for passing to a higher one. In this way, Christ-the Man Himself, He is also the peak of the happy existence the human being could reach at. This is for in Himself Christ is God too. In the Man Himself, the human beings find the resting of the eternal and infinite happiness. But just because of that, the human being who refuses the communion with Christ, that human being refuses everything." (Stăniloae 1995: 199)

"Through Christ's resurrection has been projected upon universe and upon time, the light of the meaningfulness. The present universe cannot be from ever and lasting forever, as a universe giving birth to human beings in order to kill them. If that had been the case, the present universe would have been existing by itself, but profoundly imperfect, profoundly imprinted by evil, and that would have involved a total contradiction; the universe it would have been an existence that in this intertwining between good and evil, or rather as dominated by evil, it wouldn't have had anything above, in its lack of meaning. The resurrection of Christ "it has filled everything with light". The resurrection of Christ and our resurrection into Him, it shows the final victory of the good within it, as the true relation amongst people. The Christ's resurrection gives a meaning and a target to the urge for communion, lived by the people while living into the present universe, and it shows God as working, for the universe and the people's bodies to become increasingly transparent to Him, by bringing the universe and the human beings, towards the happy eternity of their full transparence and communication with Him, and amongst themselves." (Stăniloae 1995: 202)

“As man, Christ’s relation with us as His fellow humans, it is the relation of efficiently saving us from all evil, from all estrangement from God, for He is also the Son of God. He is so naturally communicable to us as man, as our fellow human are communicable too. But in His communication with us we have too, the communication of God with us. Therefore, Christ communicates us the immortality of His humanity into spirit, namely the immortality which we can have by knowing and loving the infinite God, by the fact that Christ has made Himself so accessible to us, in His relation with us as man, as any other man, but he communicating us in the same time His victory upon body’s death, towards an eternal life into happiness. But we will reach that after we will grow up in the attachment to the infinite God through knowledge and through love and by defeating the attachment to the world as to the sole reality. We accomplish this growth also in union with Him. More precisely, in this life we don’t receive only the resurrection into spirit - through the spiritual communication with Christ and not without growing in it by our effort too - but we also receive an earnest of the participation to His resurrection with the body, through spiritual communication, but also through the powers of His resurrected body, into the Holy Mysteries and especially into the Holy Impartation. This being an impartation with His body - which lived in cleanness and it was brought as sacrifice to the Father -, it gives us also the power of making an effort in the spiritual growth in the same qualities towards the future resurrection with the body.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 17-18)

“About the resurrection into spirit which we can gain while still being in this life, or in the communication with Him spiritually through His humanity, in this life of ours, He tell us Himself with the words: “Verily, verily I say to you, that the hour comes, and it is now, when the dead ones will hear the voice of the Son of God and the ones who will hear it, they will resurrect. For as the Father has the live in Himself, so he has given it to the Son to have life in Himself” (Jn. 5: 25-26). And about the future resurrection with the body, consequent to the resurrection in the present life with the spirit, He tells us: “Do not wonder about that, for it comes the hour when all the ones from tombs, who did good deeds, they will come out towards the resurrection of the life, and the ones who did the evil deeds, they will come out towards the resurrection of the damnation” (Jn. 5: 28-29).” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 18)

“When the man fell into the knowledge of the world’s objects as submitted to some meaningless laws - namely the man feel into the spiritual death-, as one that reckoned that he reached the end of his knowledge as locked-up in nothingness, there came the godlike hypostatical Word and he took the human nature and so He opened to the human nature’s rationality, and through that He opened to the rationality of all the ones who get attached to Him, the neighboring horizon of His infinity, and so He got rid the people from the death of the finite knowledge. This is extended as effect upon the body too, and it resurrects the body too, from death.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 26)

“The man, when standing by himself, and without Christ, he is dead. But into Christ the man starts being alive even from earth, in his soul, in order him to continue to be alive after his body’s death, and at the Final Judgment, the man to resurrect with his body too, towards the eternal happy life and then it will be proven the person’s value according to his body too.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 29)

“Feeling the communication with the embodied Word, it means feeling also the godlike life live by Him in His body; and this can mean feeling it through the spiritual roots, tough sensitive, of our own body, roots remained into our soul even after our death. Maybe this is the meaning of the words of Saint Evangelist Matthew that: “many saints bodies rose and by coming out of their tombs, after His resurrection, they show themselves to many” (Mt. 27: 52-53). They probably lived anticipatedly, but very strong spiritually, their bodies, and thus they somehow felt others too, or they made other too, to feel them thus, so that it seemed them and to others that they actually bore bodies.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 31)

“But the resurrection and the ascension do not mean only a modification of the human subjectivity, but also an objective amplification of the humanity of Jesus Christ, without exiting from its general characters. While Jesus was with the human nature on the earth, His body was subjected to the irreproachable weaknesses and sufferings of the usually body. All of these impacted the soul like a sufferance. He suffered obsessions, hunger, and thirst, and pains due the nails which He was crucified with. After resurrection and ascent His body has become spiritualized, by not being subjected anymore to the conditions of the material existence on earth. The spiritual part of the human nature, and with it also the godhead, they no longer have in front of them the opaqueness of the material matter, but they were flooding in plain sight and they were manifesting themselves unimpeded. In this consists the aspect of brightness of the deified body. The Son of God could spiritualize His body and show it shiny even before His death. But He retained Himself through His godlike nature to get His body out from the general earthly law of the human trials and sufferings. He wants to follow the natural way of the human body, which only after death it exits the material conditions of the historical existence. There was almightiness into Jesus Christ also while He was on earth, and it was manifesting into the sustaining of the Universe and sometimes in wonderful deeds. But the almightiness it is in the hand of God’s will and it is used on a purpose, where and when He wants. It is not an elementary natural power which overflows everywhere without any order. By being a man amongst people, the almightiness of Christ was manifesting like love and through love, the only form which He can do them the maximum good in, by elevating them to the rank of God loving subjects and of fellow beings.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The imperishability, the brightness from after resurrection, they put a distance between Jesus and the people, though neither this is, related to them, a physical brightness, a constraining one, but a spiritual brightness, a warm one; it is the love not shadowed by the obstacle of the body; it is the love of the being which has raised above the human miseries. But just because it is no longer filtered through these human obstacles common to all people, and just because it is ascertained more obvious as being the love of God and not the love of a simple man, it is created a distance even now. For it is obvious love it brings together, but because it obviously is the love of God, it imposes respect and even fear. So, the love and the fear come antonymous together, by giving a kind of saint shyness, of a saint timid desire, like it is said in the Saint Liturgy: “With the fear of God, with faith, and with love, you come closer”. The courage of approaching is helped by the fact that the brightness of the Resurrected One, by consisting in the love manifested without the obstacles of the human body, it is though the brightness of a human face; when the apostles saw Christ after resurrection, they knew that it is just the face of the one who suffered like they were, for all the human things. If the Son of God hadn’t had a body totally like ours, the people wouldn’t have had the courage to come close to His appearance into a shining body.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Even if also the resurrection and the ascent of Jesus they mean a certain leaving of His, and a raising above all the people, in order to be able to come for the second time – being given that the heaven is a higher spiritual region – Jesus is closer to the ones from there than to the ones from the earthly life.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The resurrection establishes a new closeness amongst the human subjects, and, of course, in a way which we cannot imagine, between them and God, for, everywhere, the life of the human spirit in the pure body it is the fullest, and the spiritual realities of the world show the human spirit as more certain and more concrete.

The resurrection brought Jesus closer to the people. Of course, because their bodies are not resurrected as well, the full closeness will be accomplished after everybody’s resurrection. But His body has become a perfect environment to His soul’s manifestation, and by this, to godhead. Just this means a tighter closeness of Him to us, like a human spirit and like godhead. This closeness is understood as being of another nature than that one of the earthly body. A man in the earthly body he is close to us because his body has the inertia and the common law of our body, which our senses from here are conform to. But His spirit is less unveiled to us. Jesus was in the earthly body, in a certain way, closer to us after His resurrection - all the more, as much as His body was also deified during that time, for it was not stimulating towards sin, and the spirit was not facing so much hardship to reveal Himself through His body. But, for Jesus has taken voluntarily a body submitted to the laws of inertia, of opacity, of space, and of material maintenance, there weren't manifesting through His body, so fully, His human soul and the godhead, like they did through the resurrected body. His body from before resurrection, it included the possibility of death, and thereby, it had some shortcomings. That body didn't have the consummation of life, for it wasn't in the state of a body which defeated the death. All these constituted difficulties also to the spiritual revealing of Jesus. They explain the possibility of an ascension of His, through resurrection and ascent.

Into the earthly body, His approach was weakened and narrowed to the circle of the people among whom He was moving. After resurrection, the closeness grew up both in intensity and in broadness, by not being anymore Him impeded, by our space, in His action of being in the same time close to every man. After the resurrection He is closer to the humanity and closer to the man, being Himself elevated as humanity and as man, to a maximum spiritual communicability, just because He is a fuller environment of God's revealing.

The resurrection with the body meant both an elevation of His own state, and also a bigger closeness to people, a greater effectiveness over their spirit. These are two aspects of the same effect. But the elevation of His own state it means also a bigger closeness of Christ as man, to God.

His approach to God would not mean also an intensification of His efficiency over the human spirits, if this rising would not be of a man, of a human being, who, besides all His rising above the actual state of the people, remains in ontological connections with those. Only through the fact that He has lived into history with a real face of a man, has felt and has suffered like them and for them through all the human attributes, His rising does not get Him out from the connections with the humanity, and people are feeling through the remembrance of His face and of His historical life, but also through other more recent threads, His influence over them.

Through resurrection, Jesus, elevating Himself, as man, closer to God, He has elevated Himself, by this fact itself, to the highest stage of the mankind, which is a maximum communicability of His spirit in the relations with the people. The resurrection is the spiritualization of the body, it is the body's total overwhelming by spirit, it is the fullest actualization of the potentialities of the spirit. Because the spirit is perceived by us on the measure of our spiritual elevation, the closeness of Jesus it is experienced more powerfully by the ones who are living more through the powers of the spirit.

About the being and the attributes of the resurrected body of Jesus, we the people cannot tell anything determined and intelligible, because of us being into the earthly body.

The Gospels, on the other hand, they tell us that the body of Jesus could be felt with the hands, that it received food and, on the other hand, that He was penetrating through the locked doors, He was appearing and disappearing from the eyes of the disciples and, generally, the usual physical touch from before it was no longer possible, like it is seen in the case of Mary Magdalene, in the morning of the resurrection.

Is there a spatiality, an invisibility, and even a materiality - all of these transcending the spatiality and the materiality of the present state of this world and our perceiving capacity but being appropriate to the future form of the world which we all will belong to, after the general resurrection? Are the spatiality and the corporality from this plan, accomplishing in a satisfactory manner, the synthesis between the forms of the existence of the spirit and those of the body, between the localization and over localization, between spatialization and over spatialization? These are questions which will remain unanswered until the unveiling of that perfect form of the world will have taken place.

If the body of Jesus had ascended from the grave directly to heaven, even if this had taken place in the plain sight of the disciples, there wouldn't have been produced sufficient evidence about His resurrection. But, besides this, His remaining on earth for forty days, into some contact with the people from this world, it confirms the connection kept between the resurrected Christ and this world, and after He is not showing Himself anymore in a visible manner. Between the body of resurrected Jesus and this world, there isn't an impossibility of a relation. Because through the ascent of Jesus to heavens, He has not left His resurrected body, there doesn't exist a serious reason why His connection with this world could not continue, since, by and large, through resurrection, Jesus has established His connection with the world, and by spending more time in connection with the world, He manifested His will to keep this connection. Beside this, what meaning would have had the resurrection of Jesus with the body, if after forty days He had left His body again? The meaning of this fact is reduced to a simple demonstration of the continuation of the existence of Jesus after death.

Sergei Bulgakov finds to this also the signification of prolongation of the hierarchal ministration of Jesus among people. But the purpose of such a prolongation it is quite impossible to be highlighted.

Two questions are to be asked concerning the Lord's resurrection: 1. If people are destined to resurrect only all of them together, at the changing of the form of this world, why was Jesus an exception from this law? 2. Why Jesus has not continued to show Himself to the people to the end of the world?

Asking the question, why Jesus resurrected alone, we do not understand to ask ourselves how He had the power to resurrect, but we ask how was possible to detach Himself from the solidarity with the mankind in this regard, and to dispense Himself of the condition of the transfigured Cosmos, in order to live in a resurrected body?

The resurrection of Jesus must happen soon after His death and before the end of this world and of the resurrection of all people, for the establishment of the faith into the future resurrection and because it was impossible that not be immediately removed, by Him, any effect of the death.

The possibility to resurrect and to exist alone like a resurrected one, without the continuity with the entire transformed universe, it has its spring in His godhead. "This fact must stay in connection with the infinite advantage that Jesus has in report with the rest of us... He is the only One Who must not come back from the remoteness from God, like a lost son coming back to his parental home. Because, He has never fallen from the state of the Son... His contact with the source of life it has never been interrupted. The godhead power, which lives the entire creation from and which we have excluded from only because of our guilt, it fully crosses His being. Because the Son has taken upon Himself the helplessness and the humiliation, that was in contradiction to His real being... Once His mission was fulfilled, it was necessary to take place something similar to the construction of a dam and to the overflowing of gathered waters of the river, with a new force, in their riverbed... Here the delay was no longer possible"²³⁰." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Next to the intimacy of godhead, where dwelt the humanity of one of the three Trinitarian Persons, there were produced the necessary conditions for the existence of the resurrected body of Jesus and these conditions form the base which stays ready to receive the new form of the world or to cross through its entire reality, by imposing its laws when the time will come. In this way, through the resurrection of Jesus, it has been made the beginning of the future world, which stays for now hidden to our sight. "The resurrection of Christ it is like the awakening of the springtime. It is the beginning of the new creation of the world, which, only due to the creator pause, which we are still in, it is stopped for a while, before to be brought to its end"²³¹." (Stăniloae 1993)

²³⁰ Karl Heim, Jesus der Weltvollender, Furche-Verlag, Berlin, 1937, p. 178-9.

²³¹ Karl Heim, w. c. p. 186.

Revelation

“The natural Revelation is fully known and understood in the light of the supra-natural revelation; or, the natural Revelation is given and maintained by God, in continuation, through an above nature action of His.” (Stăniloae 2003: 9)

“The two revelations aren’t separated: the supra-natural Revelation is unfolded and it produces its effects in the frame of the natural one, as some kind of more accentuated coming into relief of the work of God, of leading the physical; and historical world towards the target it was created for, according to a plan established from ever. The supra-natural Revelation it only restored the direction and it gives a more decisive help to the movement God maintains within world through the natural Revelation. Besides, in the beginning in the fully normal state of the world, the natural Revelation was not separated from a supra-natural revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 9)

“In our faith, the cosmos’s rationality it has meaning only if cogitated before created and in all its continuity, by a knowing creator being, and only because it has been brought to existence in order to be known by a being the cosmos have been created for and, through this, in order to realize between itself and that created rational being a dialogue through its mediation. This fact constitutes the content of the natural Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 10-11)

“(…) the supra-natural Revelation represents the bringing back of the human nature to its true state, giving it in the same time power to reach its final target, towards which it aspires naturally.” (Stăniloae 2003: 25)

“The natural Revelation isn’t fully revealed to us except through the supra-natural revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 26)

“(…) the supra-natural Revelation accompanied ever since the beginning (…) the natural Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 31)

“(…) the supra-natural Revelation culminated into Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 34)

“In the person of Christ, the supra-natural acts directed to towards nature, they concern mainly the human nature and they correspond with the spiritual elevating of the human nature, by indicating the causality of the spirit in the supra-natural acts, but also the maximum level the human nature is elevated into Christ on, and the perspective which He opens to all the people who unite themselves with him by faith.” (Stăniloae 2003: 36)

“(...) the Revelation consists not so much in unveiling a sum of theoretical knowledge about a God closed in His transcendence, but in His action of descending to the man and of elevating the man to Him, until accomplishing the maximum union into Christ, as basis for extending this union between God and all the people who believe in Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 47)

“But Christ revealed (...) He remains and works further into creation, or He makes the Revelation permanent in its efficiency, in order to lead the one who believes, towards the union with Him and towards their deification, namely, through their gradual spiritualization through the Holy Ghost, using three concrete and united means: the Church, the Holy Scripture, and the Holy Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 47)

“The supra-natural Revelation ended into Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 49)

“The Revelation’s power and light reached at zenith in the sun Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 50-51)

“(...) in the natural Revelation the faith is produced by the meanings or by the evidences ascertained by the man (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 73)

“The fact that Christ judges the world, as man, it is a new honor the man is shown in, but it is also a new deification of the man. Christ’s countenance, of supreme honoring, it will show what the man should have become, and in the fact that He must judge the people, it is shown the contradiction which the people have placed themselves in, or the distance which they have remained at from the target which God wanted them to reach at. In Christ-the Judge, the people will see His humanity in a new light, and they will see also God in a new unveiling. And as the embodiment constituted to the angels too, a new revelation of God through His closeness to the creatures, by getting out of His transcendence, inaccessible in a certain sense, likewise will be the second coming of the Lord into glory and His showing like a Judge, to the angels too, a new revealing of God and, in the same time, a new highlighting of the man’s greatness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 298)

“This problem has to be formulated in the followings questions: What the Man is, in order to be chosen by God like a Revelation’s propagator? What makes the man able to fulfill this mission? Why does not every man directly receive the revelation? Or why does not the man receive it through any other means, and not through another man?

In other words, how it comes that God can speak to us better from another man, or that we feel God more penetrating when He speaks to us from another man, than from an object?

We must see, in the first place, what makes our fellow man to be different from the world of objects, be them fix or moving? What retains us, what notifies us, what strikes us at our fellow man, differing from what the objects offer us? It is not the case to analyze ourselves to see what we find in us different from objects, plant, and animals, and then to attribute that to the other people. It is about the totally special experience that we have while meeting another man, like provoked by him, experience which we cannot have when we look at ourselves with the other sight, but which we can provoke to others, but we cannot provoke to ourselves. And the other experience of the man, but not mine, in what he has like a man, different by everything is given on the objective level, we are having it in the first place and in an accentuated way, when faces us like a second person and addressing directly to us.

And then we are concerned about the man as second person, as the one who speaks directly to us, because from him each of us has received the faith. It is true that seeing a crowd or a man praying, it strengthens our faith without them being in direct communication with us. But no one has reached his faith without anybody ever confessing him his faith, in direct speaking, and nobody will feel the growth of his faith if, by watching to a group of people who prays, he does not update, having also the help of the memory, a personal state like that in which he finds when is in direct me/you report with another person. If he does not feel that one or those ones like ones who directly ask him to pray – even if those do not observe his presence – their pray will not have such a powerful effect of invigorating his faith.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If I transmit the Revelation depending on me-to report with my fellow human and, in serving him, I am doing it through by answering his concrete troubles and necessities, and not through other occupation vain of each moment struggles of the fellow human. This means that I have to participate like a factor to history, by getting aware seriously about its problems. This is for, if I do not help my fellow human with my deed, I won’t show strength of faith and I couldn’t make the other to believe. This shows that I cannot break myself away, in my conscience, from the concrete content of the instant and of the place. I am compelled to serve through all my being to the necessities put there by my fellow human here and now. I cannot deny serving service this man in this instant, by being myself satisfied with the theoretical love of the people, with the philosophy on my duty towards them²³².” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The reality of a true communication between God and man, of a bridge stretched between these two poles, and therefore the reality of a possibility to intensify this unmediated bond, it can be concluded also from the nature of the divine Revelation and from the fact that we are able to receive the divine Revelation, by distinguishing it from any earthly communication.” (Stăniloae 1992: 18)

²³² TH. STEINBÖCHEL, das Umbruch und Denkens: “Dem wirklichen Du begegnet das wirkliche Ich nur in der wirklichen geschichtlichen Situation und diese ist eine solche immer in gerichtlicher Gemeinschaft des bereutes und Standes des Volkes und Staates. In alle diese Gemeinschaftsbezüge ist der konkrete Mensch verflochten und der Ausspruch des Du an das Ich ist ein Immer ein solcher des Du in der Not, in der es hier steht, an das Ich, das hier vor Du Ich wird.“, (p.173).

“The Christendom if founded on the Revelation comprised, according to some of the Christians, in the Holy Scripture, and in the Holy Tradition and preserved within Church and, according to other Christians, only in the Holy Scripture. A change of the language that implies the rejection of this Revelation no longer can pretend that it preserved the Christendom, and the theologians proposing the forsaking of the Christian Tradition no longer can pretend for themselves the name of Christians.” (Stăniloae 2005: 5)

“We reckon that there is an apostolic typology proved to be privileged in comparison to all the later typologies and it partially determined those typologies, for the Apostles stood in the immediate influence of Christ, the Embodied God, and their human capacity of noticing the divine was elevated to a supreme degree, and so also their capacity of expressing the divine which they noticed. That’s why, the means which they expressed the Revelation with, we need to keep those. Without any doubt, there is a method for adapting the Christian language to a contemporary language, by taking heed to the essence of the Revelation, expressed through some privileged means. By anticipating the result of such research, we can say right now that the “demythologizing” and with this the forsaking of the means essentially related to expressing the Revelation it cannot be accepted, because of meaning the annulling of the Revelation; we can accept a “spiritual understanding” of the means for such an understanding corresponds to their meaning itself. Specifying, we can say that the Revelation was expressed in an essential and authentic mode through words and images, which always present a true spiritual core, which they let it be seen, and which it must be preserved even if one uses other words and images than the one which the Revelation was expressed in. A contrary, the “demythologizing” starts from the idea that the popular fantasy created a series of myths lacking any support in reality; that’s why we must reject all of these myths, and to search another core that the one expressed by them.” (Stăniloae 2005: 6-7)

“The essential unchangeable fund of the Christian Revelation is identical to a series of acts which this fund it was accomplished through, and these acts was expressed without any alteration by words and images. Even if we would use other words and images, these words and images must express the same fund of acts expressed by the original words and images, and we must always base on those ones.” (Stăniloae 2005: 6-7)

“The Christian Revelation consists of a series of acts committed by God, or promised by Him, related to the world and to the human history. The newer theology has highlighted this content of acts of the divine Revelation, unlike the older theology that considered the Revelation as “an unveiling of teachings” from God, satisfying the man’s interest of knowing the truth and of living according to the truth. In the Decree About the Divine Revelation, the Council Vatican II impropriated the idea that the Revelation consists especially of acts of God, after a Protestant theological school, so-called “of the history of the salvation” (...) saw the Revelation as a string of acts of God within history, and the salvation as a gradual accomplishment during history.” (Stăniloae 2005: 8)

“God works continuously upon the people who want to open themselves to this work and His work goes on a by and large progressive trend. But not all this work is usually called as Revelation. Revelation in own sense it is when the word of God unveils actions directed towards history. The Revelation presupposes this action, it has the action as a component act. God isn’t only a teacher of the people, letting them to work exclusively with their powers. But the God’s action is only a component of the Revelation. The second component of the Revelation is the word, through which the man’s attention is drawn upon God’s action. The word precedes or follows to, or precedes and follows to, the most important moments, the most decisive moment of God’s actions promoting history. God urges the people to open themselves to the energy communicated and promised by God in order some more important historical acts to be accomplished, and in order that energy to be used by people with all their power for fulfilling these acts, or for answering, with gratitude and with trust the help granted by God, and to be elevated to a life of superior fulfilling the will of God. But often, the word of God as Revelation it is communicated also when the people ceased receiving the will of God, in order to explain them the forsaking by God and in order to urge them to fulfill His will so that to be able to receive new acts of help. The forsaking is, too, an act of God and it isn’t a forsaking in a total sense. Anyway, the word is accompanied even then at least by the promise of a future help from God. A word of God totally lacking any support of the happened past, present, or future action of God, it is never communicated.” (Stăniloae 2005: 14)

“In the period of the Prophets, The Revelation was done not so much through contemporary to them acts of God, as through words promising future acts. The words were preponderantly prophecies, and not unveilings of some divine taking place acts promoting new crossroads in history. Those words unveiled at most a work of God promoting an unnoticed progress in history. The prophets’ words are in the same time an “apocalypse”, or an unveiling of the hidden meaning of the history and of the divine energy which unnoticedly help the history’s unfolding. They no longer unveiled great, contemporary to prophets, acts of God, because the people Israel, in their ensemble, they refuse to open themselves any longer to some divine acts which promote a historical progress of visible jumps. The people of Israel established then, in the Law’s prescriptions, as in a system of forms which to preserve them as a nation craving for earthly power, avid of history, in the sense of raising to an ever-greater worldly power, history done by the people Israel only by its own powers. They no longer saw in the law the prophetic meaning, they no longer use the Law for their spiritual-moral progress, for advancing towards a state of brotherly openness towards all the other peoples, in order to communicate those peoples, the promises given by God and His superior expectations. The people of Israel no longer wanted to contribute to the accomplishment of such a history.” (Stăniloae 2005: 14-15)

“But God led the obedient “remnant” of Israel towards the promised state, which He will intervene in, with new, decisive acts, in order to elevate the world on a totally new spiritual level. This is for the prophetic words are acts too, by the effects produces within souls by the urges comprised in the increasingly clearer promises those words made. The words suggestively described the states which God will produce in the future, they created some anticipations, some foretasting of the future states. In order the souls to be capable of that foretasting, of anticipately living the promised future states, promising those states must be done on the moment when their souls have been elevated to this capacity. The Moments of the Revelation adapted, from this point of view too, to the moment crossed through by the man’s soul in his ascension, so that the prophecy, in addition to the whole divine origin it has, it corresponds also to a certain level of the man’s capacity of seeing. All the more, the fulfillment of the prophecy is done when the soul’s state, at least of some of the people, it has become capable of the new state brought by the prophecy.” (Stăniloae 2005: 15)

“The acts prophesied and prepared by the whole Revelation of the Old Testament, were: the embodiment of the Son of God, His crucifixion, His resurrection, and His ascent as man, the sending of the Holy Ghost since the foundation of the Church, and the continuous work of the Holy Ghost through and within Church. All these acts, except the continuous work of the Holy Ghost withing and through the Church, are acts of the divine Revelation, being accompanied by words drawing the attention upon them and clarifying their meanings. The work of the Holy Ghost within Church is no longer, properly-said, a Revelation, for it is no longer accompanied by new godlike words, which to clarify this work and which to show how its adaptation to the new circumstances and human problems. This is for the embodiment of the Son of God as man and the other savior acts of His, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, they comprise in them everything that was to be accomplished on the wide scale, as spiritual progress, as union of the human with God, to the end of time.” (Stăniloae 2005: 15-16)

“Neither Moses nor his generation had within them the knowledge and the state which the pious Jews must reach at the end of the era of the Old Testament, in order to be able to receive Christ. They had to reach this state gradually, through new revelatory acts of God. But Christ has within Himself, through resurrection and ascent, in a consummate manner, everything that must be obtained by the ones who will believe in Him to the end of them, they must achieve; in Christ it has been revealed everything we will become not only to the end of time but in eternity too, this eternally be the target which we must aim at. In Christ the Revelation has come to an end. It is finished not only through the acts which accomplished in Him the final and eternal state which must aim at, but it is finished in words too. This is for Christ clarifies in words too, what means not only the final and eternal state accomplished through His acts, but also our need for tending towards achieving it, and the way which we can achieve it in, and the way which He, through the Holy Ghost, will help us to achieve it in. The teaching of Jesus is a prophecy forever, to the end of the world, as His embodiment, sacrifice, resurrection, and ascent, they created within Jesus-the Man, and the descent of the Holy Ghost created in the first Christians, the state that was to become characteristic to all the ones who believe. So, this teaching has the prophetic meaning and dynamism covering the whole duration of the history, even that one from after the time has ended.” (Stăniloae 2005: 16)

“This prophecy was made by the Apostles too, for they were inspired by Christ and by His state from after resurrection and ascent. Saint Apostle Paul said: “And when Christ Who is your life, will shows Himself, then you too, together with Him, will be able to show yourselves into glory” (Col. III: 4). Until then the believers strive, cogitating as Saint Apostle Paul did: “In order to know Him and the power of His resurrection and I to be receives as partaker to His passions and to be like Him in His death, so that somehow to reach the resurrection from dead” (Philip. III: 10-11). But this endeavor is upheld within believers by the Ghost of Christ: “And I am convinced about this, that the One Who started the good thing for you, He will bring it to an end until the day of Christ” (Philip. I: 6). This prophecy has been done, not only for the individual believers, but for the whole history, especially by Apostle John, through Apocalypse, the only book exclusively prophetic of the New Testament, the only book showing the hidden meaning of the history to the history’s end, and what will be after the end of the historical time.” (Stăniloae 2005: 16-17)

The Revelation into Christ is a new level in comparison to the revealing from the Old Testament. It is accomplished in an ensemble of new acts, of another order, which the mankind has been prepared for. The force of these acts will work in other people too. The revealing from the end of time it will be, somehow, a new one in comparison to the one from the time of the embodiment, resurrection, and ascent of Christ, and of the descent of the Holy Ghost, but in another sense, that revealing will be the same with that one into Christ, being only the experience within the believers’ persons of what it is actualized in Christ. That's why it has been said in the New Testament that in Christ "it has been reached the end of time". On the other hand, the explosive extension within everybody of the state of Christ at the end of time, it will be a totally new act of the Revelation, its supreme act, and not a simple completion of the teaching. It will bring a deepened and increased knowledge only for it will bring a new state through a new act.

In order to prepare themselves for that state, the people are called to make efforts of superior order, in their freedom, in order to impropriate themselves - as much as possible - out of the state of Christ, and not to simply bringing a cult to the unique God. This period needs the support of a theocratic state, which to uphold with its force these spiritual principles of the mankind." (Stăniloae 2005: 17-18)

"The complete Revelation has been accomplished, in a certain sense, through the acts of Christ's: embodiment, crucifixion, resurrection, ascent, and through the descent of the Holy Ghost. We make this Revelation in Christ as actual for us, this Revelation being in the same time the state of Christ-the Man achieved through the mentioned acts of the Revelation." (Stăniloae 2005: 18)

"The Revelation isn't a simple communication of teachings, but it is a continuously new state of the man, by the man's coming closer to God. The Revelation in Christ is a new state of the humanity assumed by the Son of God, and the Revelation of the future life is a state like that one of Christ-the Man in everybody who will believe in Him." (Stăniloae 2005: 18)

"The Christian Revelation is given in a Person, in the divine-human Person of Christ, and it is the effect of the acts of the Son of God of embodiment in a man, of crucifixion, of resurrection, and of ascent as man, and of sending His Ghost within world." (Stăniloae 2005: 18)

"The Christendom without the Revelation understood as such, it cannot exist. An adaptation of the Christendom to world, by rejecting these acts of Christ, which are the essential acts of the Christian Revelation, it equals to the forsaking of the Christendom. A theological language that, due to the desire to adapt the Christendom, it would no longer express the content of this acts of the Revelation, will no longer be a theological Christian language." (Stăniloae 2005: 19)

"The Revelation wasn't done only through acts and words, which continue working within souls, but also through images. This fact was newly highlighted by some Anglican Theologians, by opposing the images to myths." (Stăniloae 2005: 23)

“Between acts and word, on one hand, and images, on the other hand, there isn’t a report of independence; so, we reckon in this sense that it will be solved the problem of the report between word and image in Revelation and in the Christian preaching, which the Anglican theologian Richardson reckons as being a big future theological problem. The word and the image are interior to one another. The only difference is that in word predominated the meaning and, in the image predominated the shape. But neither the meaning excludes the shape, nor the shape is meaningless. “But the words too, are icons of the things”, says Patriarch Nicephorus the Confessor.” (Stăniloae 2005: 23)

“To the not-fullness of the God’s presence in the images of the Old Testament, and therefore in the people from that time too, it belonged also that those images were taken from the nature’s elements or even from animals. The level of understanding which the man was on, it didn’t allow the overcoming of using some of the nature’s elements as images of God. It is right that those images didn’t accomplish this function in a general mode and through themselves, but through a special divine act, which indicated in the same time, the difference between God and them. Like in the Book of the Genesis (VII: 13), or like in Apocalypse (XIV: 14), the Son of Man appears after the apparition of the wild beasts, so in the culminant Revelation God takes the image of the man, after He used natural elements as fugitive and incomplete images. The history of the Revelation is tied to the history of the mankind. On the measure the man progresses spiritually or grows up in his conscience about his superiority to the nature, he realizes that he is the more adequate image of God, and he actually become that. As long as the man didn’t understand this dignity of his, as long as he was timorous by the force of the natural elements, he couldn’t represent God in a dignified manner in front of the nature. Of course, the reign of the wild beasts it doesn’t mean only a reign of the wild beasts as zoological species, but also the reign of that man that was still preserving much of the wild beasts’ behavior. By becoming the man aware of the fact that he is image of God and, on this level, God making in Christ, out of the human nature and in a real mode, His most adequate image, it started the development of the human in everything that is human, in everything that distinguish the human from animal. Thus starts the eternal and continuously perfected reign of the man or of the human upon the whole universe, and upon everything that is animalic. This reign attracts to itself in the resurrected and ascended Christ, a peak which to tend towards, a force that attracts it and it penetrates it. There is nothing to be more spiritualized (of course, through God become man) than the man who is spirit and through nothing one can place a seal of spirituality more categorically than through man. And this is what God wants.” (Stăniloae 2005: 27-28)

“The words accompany also the revealing of the Son of God in Christ, in this consistent, intimate, and definitive image of His person. But these words are influenced by the imaginative character of God’s Revelation into Christ. And the words describing the revealing of God in the image of the humanity assumed by His Person, they can vary; we aren’t compelled to exclusively remain at the words of Jesus and of the Apostles, even if we must always bear in mind their words as normative.” (Stăniloae 2005: 29-30)

“In the Old Testament the symbol had, in addition to the general meaning, a special meaning too. The symbol had, namely, a prophetic meaning, fore-imagining the future Messiah, namely the Embodiment of the Word. This special signification it wasn’t possible to be had by the things and by the beings from within world on the basis of the simple fact of their appurtenance to a world created by God, but on the basis of an unveiling of some special intentions of God regarding the world and by indicating some things as symbols of those intentions, through a special revelation of God. Better said, if the general meaning of the things from within world, as symbols, it was unveiled by the primordial revelation, before the falling of our proto-parents into sin, through which to those ones was made known the world’s origin by the creator act of God, the special meaning of some objects as prophetic symbols, are fore-imaginings of the future embodiment of the Word and of His savior acts, it wasn’t unveiled to the people except through a string of revelations shared them after their falling into sin, given the fact that only after that God made known His promise of sending His Son within world in order to save the world and He preserved, through certain symbols, the messianic waiting within the people of Israel.” (Stăniloae 2005: 69)

“The symbol, in this special meaning as revealing the coming of Messiah, it is founded on one hand on the world’s character as creature of God, and on the other hand on the special relation which the divine revelation has placed in, some objects from this created world with the future Embodiment of the Word.” (Stăniloae 2005: 69)

“Of course, the self-revelation of God through word and human manifestation it is not equal to the self-revelation of God in an unveiled way, but it remains far away behind it. The unveiling of God in Jesus Christ is only an unveiling under the veil of the being and of the means of the human manifestation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Sacrifice

“Any removal of one of the direction Christ has in His hierarchal ministration, it depletes the meaning and the efficacy of the savior work of Christ. The western theology - Catholic and Protestant -, by eliminating the effect of the hierarchal ministration Christ exercises upon His human nature, and by reckoning this ministration only as work of satisfying the honor of God on behalf of the people who offended God by their sin, or by reckoning it only as expiation of the people’s guilt, the mentioned theologies have removed the whole preoccupation for restoring the human nature by sacrifice, firstly in Christ, and by this in the ones who believe in Him, namely the whole ascetic, sanctifying, and deifying effort of the sacrifice, and by and large they have reduced this to a simple juridical operation, one external to the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 55)

“The Holy Fathers highlighted so much the effect of the sacrifice directed towards restoring, sanctifying, and deifying the human nature in Christ, and by this in all the ones who believe in Him, than sometimes, some Orthodox theologians has been tempted to see in Christ’s sacrifice lesser a ministration directed towards God, towards extolling God, and therefore those theologians have highlighted more the ministration directed towards restoring the Christ’s human nature and, by this, the human nature of the other people. This has been done in opposition to the Catholic theology which was affirming that the sin didn’t weaken and it didn’t crooked the human nature, but it only offended God, and therefore the sacrifice had nothing to correct in our nature, but it only removed the upset of the offended God, in order the nature to be admitted again in relation with God and adorned with the supra-natural gifts; or, in opposition to the Protestant theology, which admits that through sin not only that God was offended, but also our nature has been altered to totally than it cannot be healed, but one can only be given, by expiating the guilt in front of Him, the promise of a restoration in the future life. Opposing these theories, some Orthodox theologians affirmed that it cannot be admitted that God is upset with the man due to the sin and that He claims some sacrifice in order to forgive the man; that’s why the sacrifice wouldn’t have any purpose than to restore the human nature in Christ and to gain the people’s love for Him and for God; right this constitutes a restoration of their nature, necessary for the people’s nature was ill consequently to their separation from God and to their enmity towards Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 55)

“The more comprising understanding of the sacrifice of Christ is that one that sees both its direction aiming towards God and its direction aiming towards the human nature assumed by Christ, and towards the human nature of the other people. This conception belongs to the Holy Fathers and it is in accord with the one of the Holy Scripture.” (Stăniloae 2006: 55)

“The fact that, through the sacrifice brought to the Father, Christ has restored and has deified the human nature too, it gives the direction of the Hierarchal ministration aiming towards God, another meaning than the one of a simple satisfying of the offended honor of God. God couldn’t love the sinful state of the people, which is an enmity of the people towards Him. Christ, as man, by correcting towards sacrifice the state of enmity the human nature had towards God, he gains right by this the love of God for the human nature. Or vice versa: by manifesting through sacrifice the will of totally giving, on Himself, to God, the human nature is restored, just by this, from its ill state. There are two inseparable aspects of the sacrifice. A parent rejoices of his child who comes back to the respect towards him, not for the parent sees by this his honor restored, but because by this respect his child shows him again, the parent sees the moral principles and even the ontological basis restored in his child’s being.” (Stăniloae 2006: 56)

“In short, the sacrifice serves for reestablishing the communion between God and man. The reestablished communion means though, both the human nature restored from its egotism and the love of God manifested without being impeded in it will of adorning the man with its gifts, unimpeded by the man’s inimical egotism. The man’s sacrifice is necessary - for reestablishing the communion - both to God and to the man.” (Stăniloae 2006: 56)

“The Holy Scripture and the Holy Fathers see as present in the hierarchical ministration and in the Christ’s sacrifice, all the three directions (towards God, towards Christ’s human nature, and towards people, t. n.), in a reciprocal inter-conditioning that gives them the mentioned meaning.” (Stăniloae 2006: 56)

“In what regards the direction of Christ’s sacrifice towards God, we have seen what the Epistle towards Jews says (Hebr. 5: 1, 7). The Christ’s sacrifice fulfills the sacrifices from the Old Testament, which were all of them directed towards God, of course, on the benefit of the people: “He entered only once in the Holy of the Holies, but not with goat blood, or of calves, but with His own blood, and He achieved an eternal redemption” (Hebr. 9: 12).” (Stăniloae 2006: 56)

“Through the sacrifice brought to God, Christ, in the same time, He consummates, on Himself, as man. And by this, He sanctifies or He consummates other people too. So it was also with the sacrifices from the Old Testament. “By making, on Himself, consummate, He has made, on Himself, cause of eternal salvation” (Hebr. 5: 9). “Because of the blood of the goats and of the bulls and the heifer’s ash, by spraying the defiled ones, they sanctify them towards the body’s cleanness, all the more through the blood of Christ Who, through the eternal Ghost, He has brought, on Himself, to God, as sacrifice without blemish, you cleaned up your thought of the dead deeds, in order to serve the living God" (Hebr. 9: 13-14). "And into this will we are sanctified, through the sacrifice of the body of Christ, once and for all... For through a sole sacrifice brought, He brought to consummation the ones who are sanctified" (Hebr. 10: 10, 14)." (Stăniloae 2006: 56)

"The content of Christ's death, as sacrifice directed towards God and with a great effect upon His humanity, it is in the same time a total surrender of Christ, as man, to the Father. And the motivation of the sufferance involved in Christ's death, because of Christ's connection with the people who were estranged from God, it is the deep and the total compassion Christ has for the people. This compassion brought Him to death for the people, as total surrender to the Father, in order to determine the people too to surrender to the Father, and it is itself an efficient force upon the people, but also upon Christ's humanity. This compassion is a great sufferance for the people's sin, but, though, it cannot liberate them by itself. It must infuse them too, the impulse of dying to their own egotism, by taking power out of His death before the Father. Christ manifests His compassion even on the cross: "Forgive them for they do not know what they are doing". Christ is hurt by the people's insensitiveness and misery, but this also gives Him power to die in order to get them out of such a state. In Gethsemane He is scared of death, but His compassion for people it helps Him to overcome the death, although, on the other hand, His compassion makes Him suffering too. Jesus Christ's psychology was too much simplified, too much dehumanized in the scholastic theology, by being reduced to an act of singular juridical satisfaction. But Christ remains permanently in state of sacrifice in the double meaning of His surrender as man to the Father and of His compassion for the people." (Stăniloae 2006: 56)

"But if we are saved for we impropriate the state of sacrifice and the new life the body of Christ has reached by His sacrifice, this sacrificed and resurrected body receives a permanent central importance in our salvation, meant like being cleanness of sins and like getting out of sin, or getting out of the enmity towards God, and like participation to the godlike life. But His body has this permanent central importance for it is the body of God-the Word. Only thus it is filled with the whole godlike life; only thus His body is the incandescent ring we all are transmitted the godlike fire through, a fire that has removed the death in Him, and out of Him is being extended in us too, in order to illuminate us, to clean us, to deify us, and to melt down the power of the death from within us. Out of this, one can see that the body of Christ has this permanent central importance, for it hasn't been sacrificed by somebody else, namely without Christ's will, but by the its Subject Himself, namely out of Christ's own will, the One Who had in Himself the Godhead bore by the Hypostasis of the Word. Christ is thus not only the Teacher and the teaching hypostatized through Himself, but he is also the Hierarch and the Sacrifice by Himself. The first thing wouldn't have been, if the second one hadn't been; or vice versa. The Hierarch is one with the Sacrifice. Or the Sacrifice in one with the Hierarch. That's why the Sacrifice is culminant and the Hierarch is culminant. But, also for that the Teacher and the teaching are culminant." (Stăniloae 2006: 57)

"The active disposition of sacrifice it equals to the convergence movement; but this happens not only between the Son of God become Man and the ones who believe in Him, but also amongst all the believers. This is because the will of God which the believers put themselves in accord to, it wants them to be in the report of sacrifice and convergence with one another." (Stăniloae 1997: 71)

"There is no separation between Christ's Sacrifice of and our sacrifice. There is a full encounter between Christ and us, an intimate communication in the disposition of sacrifice and the state of sacrifice, His and ours. Thus, on one hand we offer ourselves to God, and on the other hand Christ takes us and frames us in His sacrifice, or He actualizes His sacrifice for us, as our sacrifice brought by Him, or He makes His sacrifice to be ours." (Stăniloae 1997: 73)

"In order to actualize the sacrifice of Christ in diverse communities – the sacrifice of Christ being the sole one the Christians can bring – there are needed the priests. But these priests must perform also a spiritual together-bringing of themselves with Christ, together with the believers. The Christ's sacrifice doesn't work magically, because of not producing its effect only through the shed of blood from yore, like the animals' blood; but the sacrifice of Christ works through His all-clean blood or full of the power of the Holy Ghost, which fills up also the ones who are imparted with Him with the same power of bringing themselves to God." (Stăniloae 1997: 107)

"If any answer of ours to the Father's appeal, or the whole our surrender to the Father, through prayer and deeds of self-surpassing, it receives its power out of the power of sacrifice or of the consummate surrender of Christ, it is obvious that the attracting of our deceased ones in this act of surrendering to the Father, it will be due also to Christ. This is for if He brought Himself as sacrifice for everybody, in order all the people to be brought as sacrifice in Him, the power of His sacrifice doesn't stop at the ones who still are in the life on earth, but it stretches to all the ones who ended their life in faith, in dialogue with Him and with the fellow humans; it stretches by itself and also through the other believers. Christ with His sacrifice offered ceaselessly for everybody, by keeping everybody in connection with Him, in the dialogue of their bringing to the Father together with Himself, he is the source of the Church's universality." (Stăniloae 1997: 226)

"The sin as fulfilling the egotistic lusts, while forgetting about God, it is darkness. The man's self-giving as a gift, to God, or the man's self-sacrifice, it is the openness towards the source of the light and towards receiving the limitless and endless life from God, namely of discovering the meaning of the man's own existence and of the man's living into God." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 85)

"The man, once fallen through Adam, he hasn't been able to self-giving as a gift, to God, or of bringing himself as clean sacrifice to God. This was shown in the fact that God asked the man to bring, instead of the man himself, as sacrifices, animals which do not commit sin, but they neither have conscience so that they would be able to bring themselves as sacrifices to God. But in order to show that God wants a clean sacrifice, which not to be at all dominated by the egotistic lust, God asked for the sacrifice to be fulfilled at least symbolically, and in order to do that the animals brought as sacrifices must be young animals. This was shown by God on the occasion given to Abraham for bringing sacrifice to God, instead of his son, a ram, after God saw Abraham's capacity to obey Him, to the extent of giving the most precious thing we had, namely his own son, the first and the only begotten one. With that sacrifice replacing the self-sacrifice, or the sacrifice of the firstborn children as the most loved children, God was content, under the Law from before the Coming of His Son into body." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 85)

"God still let, after the sin the people fell in, the death, despite the symbolic sacrifice, in order the people to see that through the lamb's sacrifice and, by and large, the animal sacrifices, they do not really escape the people from death. But God also let the death as possibility for His Son Who followed to make Himself man, in order to receive death as sinless and totally innocent and voluntary sacrifice, of God for the people, and by that to become to the ones who believe in Christ a means of their crossing to the life into happiness, a life of the fullest communion with God." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 86)

"It was necessary to come the sinless Man, of a greater value than the value of all the people together, in order Him to bring Himself as sacrifice, to God, for all the people, as the true Lamb, to replace with full efficiency the lamb of the sheep. In the sacrifice of the Law's lamb it is shown, prophetically, the hope of the crossing the mankind from death to life. It was, in this sense, a light, but it was rather a light as a hope in coming to the people of the true Light, equivalent to elevating the people from "the darkness of the death" into the life's light." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 86)

“There is a tight connection between the birth out of Virgin and the efficient sacrifice brought by Christ, as proof of loving God, namely of unveiling His light to the people.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 87)

“In the sacrifice of Christ, the embodied Son of God, there is the sacrifice of the Son of God Who brought it, as man, to the Father. In Christ’s sacrifice one can see the whole loving light of the Son of God, or all the saving love of the Holy Trinity. Or, the Father Himself sends His Son to make Himself man and to sacrifice Himself to the Father, through His Ghost of Son, in order to make the people whom His Son sacrifices Himself for, as beloved sons. It isn’t here about a satisfaction brought to the offended honor of God, through the sacrifice of an equal value, or of a greater value than the human sin, but it is about the limitless love of a Father sending His Son to bring Himself as sacrifice for the people, in order the people to see in the Son’s sacrifice the loving to the death sacrifice of the people who inappropriate from the Son of God and from one another, gradually, the Son’s sacrifice, forever.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 94)

“This great meaning of Christ’s sacrifice, namely as supreme light of the love of the Son of God made man, shown to the people themselves in order they to inappropriate it, at their turn, as value and meaning of their existence, it is expressed by the Savior Himself through the words which the Holy Mystery of the Impartation - with His body and blood, sacrificed for us - it was founded through.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 95)

“Only by totally giving yourself, as sacrifice, to another, out of your freedom, you will enter the sanctuary of his intimacy or of his heart. Only by totally giving His humanity as a gift, to the Father, Christ entered with His humanity in the Holy of the Holies of His godhead. And Christ help to enter with Him, also the ones who, by uniting themselves with Him in state of sacrifice, they inappropriate, at their turn, this state of sacrifice. This is for He has brought Himself as sacrifice on this purpose. This means that He has brought Himself as sacrifice for us. Due to this love of His, Christ doesn’t passively wait for us in order us to unite ourselves with Him, but He spreads out of this state of His, the state of love that has brought Him to sacrifice Himself for us, namely the attraction power for uniting us with Him in His state of sacrifice. A mother who suffers for her son, herself attracts her son to be partaker to her full of love sufferance for him, and by that, she attracts him to get out of his impassive egotism.” (Stăniloae 1995: 194)

“Like Christ as man, by bringing Himself as sacrifice to the Father, He no longer lives except for the Father, but Christ lives for the Father for us, by being united with the Father and with us at maximum, likewise us, by dying to all the things and to ourselves, for His sake, we live only for Him and for the Father Who Christ died to, but we live as He wants, for other too. “This is for Christ's love keeps us together, for we reckon that if One died for all, all have died too. And He dies for all the ones who live for no longer they to live for themselves, but they to live for That One Who died and resurrected for them" (II Cor. 5: 14-15)." (Stăniloae 1995: 194)

"Saint Cyril of Alexandria highlighted the fact that through the death as sacrifice (be it only a spiritual death) we enter, together with Christ, at the Father. Saint Cyril insistently repeated the fact that one cannot enter at the Father, except in state of clean sacrifice. And we cannot be elevated to the state as clean sacrifice except into Christ. Through the clean sacrifice, that that has forsaken any egotism, the human being enters with Christ at the Father's heart, as he enters at his brothers' heart, according to the Father's will." (Stăniloae 1995: 194-195)

"The Son of God has made Himself the human loved by the Father, by the fact that He has made Himself man, through the sacrifice which He has given Himself through, to the Father, as man, he has made the Father's love for the human being to ascend on a supreme level. But through His sacrifice as man, for the people, the Son of God has communicated too, to His brothers into humanity, the power of His love for they to be able too, to sacrifice themselves to the Father." (Stăniloae 1995: 195)

"In Christ's sacrifice as man and in our sacrifice out of the power of His sacrifice, the humanity lives the highest transcendence to the Person-Absolute, and the highest union with Him." (Stăniloae 1995: 195)

Saints

“If the beauty consists in the manifestation of the spirit through matter, the greatest beauty is the irradiation of the spirit through the living body, and this takes place when the body is no longer mastered by materiality, and then the spirit’s superior features become transparent through the matter in a manner unimpeded by matter. This fact requires not so much artistic craftsmanship, but an ethical effort. One can say that the saint has accomplished within himself the true beauty of the human being: decency, balance, conquering spiritual light. To this work of spiritualizing the matter, which is characteristic to the man, all the spiritual beings and God Himself come to the man’s help, in order to strengthen the man’s spirit. The temptations coming to the man from his body and from the seen world, they are strong, but the man’s work is important too if he accomplished it. That’s why the man is being helped by God and by the bodiless ghosts. This is for the divine spirituality is being revealed through this in a new form, better said, the multitude of the divine features find as many sensitive images amongst people.” (Stăniloae 2003: 446)

“The Saints are imparted with a fore-tasting of the eternity of God while they still are in the course of their terrestrial life.” (Stăniloae 2003: 183)

“While during the temporal life only the Saints reach to be partakers, in some moments, to eternity, at the end of this life, on the eschatological plan, all the ones who believed and strived to life according to the will of God they will be imparted with eternity, for they will be imparted with the communion with the uncreated God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 184)

“The saints see even in this life, at distance, and they act at distance.” (Stăniloae 2003: 209)

“The love from God which the saints enjoy with, by being the love of the three godlike Persons consummately united, it produces in the saints also a love for one another, especially for they are together recapitulated in Christ. But this doesn’t mean that there is no difference in their capacity of being imparted with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 211)

“The love of the righteous ones, for one another, it must be directed also towards the people on earth, whom they are in a certain degree recapitulated in Christ with, namely together bathed in Christ’s love. And the love for the one who need help it consists of helping them. From here comes that the saints help the people on earth in their difficulties, in order them to overcome those difficulties, and especially in their need for salvation. This is consequently also to the fact that they feel in their being the whole preoccupation of Christ for helping and saving the people on earth. If they “go after the Lamb wherever He goes” (Apoc. 14: 4) and if He said: “Behold, I am with you on all the days to the end of time”, the saints are also them nigh to us spiritually, for Christ is never alone.” (Stăniloae 1997: 211-212)

“Like the angels from heavens rejoice for every soul who strives for being saved, for the Lord Himself rejoices for that – so that the one who doesn’t work for his salvation makes the angels sad –, the same interest must be manifested by the righteous ones too, who will be “like the angels in heavens”. (Stăniloae 1997: 212)

“The saints are nigh to Christ, they “have daring” at Him. Jesus has declared them as His friends (Jn. 15: 14) and he assured them that: “If you remain into Me and My words remain into you, you will ask everything you will want and it will be done to you” (Jn. 15: 7). “Ask for and you will receive, for your joy to be full” (Jn. 16: 24). ON the basis of these assurances from the Lord, the Church is convinced that the Saints put this daring of their, in the service of the love for the ones who need help and for their salvation, by asking for this help and for the salvation of these ones, from Christ, as Abraham did to (Gen. 18: 23-33). For only thus “their joy is full”. Only when we will see ourselves as saved together with them, at the end of the world, they too will take in fullness the eternal joy (Hebr. 11: 40). This is for the joy is the greater as it is imparted by the many, and therefore God is known in a fuller richness as he shines in many souls, if “The Kingdom of Heavens is within us”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 212)

“Confident in this love of the saints for us and in their daring towards Christ, the Church and all of us who are the Church’s limbs, we ask the Saints for praying to Christ for us. We do not ask them for giving us this help from them, because as human beings they have nothing from themselves, but they have everything from Christ, and they have more than everybody this conscience. We ask them only for praying to Christ for us in order Him to give us the useful things in this life and the eternal salvation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 212)

“If we reckon the saints as united with Christ, if we ask for their prayers towards God for us, we honor them and we praise them for the richness of gifts which they have reached in Christ to, through the witness the bore for Christ, through their word and life. By praising the saints and by honoring them, we praise Christ Himself Who has filled the saints up with so much brightness, and Who elevates their humanity at so much consummation in Him. The honor, the praising of theirs it is not separated from the praise brought to Christ, for their brightness isn’t but the brightness of Christ, though His brightness highlighted the culminant beauty of the saints’ general and personal humanity and though the saints have become subjects of this brightness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 212)

“Even the praising brought to the saints it is mainly praising of Christ, for He is the prime and the main source of the saints’ brightness. The shinier appears Christ and more worthy to be extolled, the more His work it shows the fruition in the human nature. In an isolated manner, Christ wouldn’t show His glory either in people or in the fruitfulness of His savior and deifier work. A householder highlights his worthiness in his flourishing household, and in the worthiness of his servants; a mother highlights her fruitful love in the beings of her many well-behaved children. That’s why Christ taught us in the Lord’s Prayer to ask for “You name to be hallowed”. It is about the sanctification of this name amongst people, for if he had been satisfied with the holiness that he has in Himself, this one wouldn’t have been an object of our prayer. That’s why Jesus urged us: “So to shine your light before the people that, by seeing they your good deeds, they to glorify your Father Who is in heavens”. (Mt. 5: 16).” (Stăniloae 1997: 212-213)

“Through people it is shown the holiness and the glory of God. And that’s why the people owe to strive themselves for this highlighting of the holiness and of the glory of God, through their life. Only on those who made shown the glory and the holiness of God, He glorifies and sanctifies them. The glory and the holiness of God don’t remain to them as external. The efficacy of the glory and of the holiness of God, are shown in the fact that they elevate to the state of the glory and of the holiness the people’s humanity itself. Aware of the fact that the honor given to them it is for the glory and for the holiness of God, which gild their humanity too, or that the glory and the holiness of God are imprinted and it irradiates out of their humanity, the saints remain in a state of culminant humbleness. Themselves they do not see this glory and this holiness of theirs, for they feel more than everybody that the glory and the holiness aren’t gifts from themselves, but the other people are the ones who see their glory and their holiness – when the glory and the holiness are attributed to them, the saints do not recognize that. The saints distinguish between themselves as human beings and the glory and the holiness of God, so that only others see the glory and the holiness as become characteristic to the saints, and not the saint. That’s why praising them within Church is possible only for they cannot stop us from doing it, by not being visible present. They can be praised only in a visible absence of theirs. Better said, they are present within Church on holidays, or on each time when they are praised, but they are present in a form which they cannot stop us visibly from praising them in, but they can help us through their prayers towards God. But even their invisible humbleness at the time of them being praised by us, by irradiating towards us, it gives us an even stronger force to praise them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 213)

“Each person’s humanity it is accomplished in Christ in solidarity with all the fellow humans. Everybody confesses about the value of each man, in everybody’s solidarity with each one. The saints show their fully actualized in Christ humanity through the love shown by them to their brothers, a love that is the love they have impropriated from Christ. The saints show their brothers this love through their prayers. And the people on earth show their will to ascend towards the actualization of their true humanity, through the honor they grant to the ones who have reached the target of their humanization into Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 214)

“The glory of the saints it is shown also in the leavened bread pieces – cut off at the Holy Liturgy – pieces which represent them, placed around the Lamb of God which is transformed in the body of Christ. Through the bread pieces placed on the same disk, it is also shown the solidarity of all the rightly-worshipping Christians, strengthened through their bond with Christ. But the glory itself of Christ is shown through the saints and through the righteous who are continuously multiplied through His sacrifice, which they are imparted with in the form of the Eucharist, and which power they activate through their life in cleanness, and in heavens, through their increasingly brightness and love towards Christ and towards their brothers on earth. That’s why each Eucharist is both for the glory of Christ and towards the glory of the saints. But then, the glory of the Lord’s Mother it is shown also through the multitude of the saints and through their advancing into a greater glory, though in itself this glory is the glory of Christ too. Even to the coming closer of the people on earth, to His sacrifice, and to the fructification of this sacrifice, the saints contribute too with their prayers. And this contribution to the multiplication of the saved ones in brings at its turn, to the saint, an increase of glory and joy. Even more than that, Saint John Chrysostom and Mark the Ephesian reckon that not only the deceased righteous are praying for the people on earth, but also these ones, at their turn, they must pray, when the sacrifice is being brought, for the deceased ones, either righteous or sinners. This is for out of that, they can have an increase of glory and joy, making them to advance towards the full glory from the last judgment, which they will take it together with all the saved ones.” (Stăniloae 1997: 216)

“The spiritual presence of the saints, in front with the Lord’s Mother, around Christ Who is represented in Eucharist in His state of continuous sacrifice, it means also the fact that everybody live their union with God as a continuously and mysteriously dying with Christ, as their surrender, as human beings, to God. It is about a mysterious death of the nature’s powers in order they to suffer their deification through God. It is a continuation of their mysterious death and resurrection on earth. In this sense we pray to be more truly imparted with Christ, in the undying day of His Kingdom. The Apocalypse meaningfully present Christ as a stabbed Lamb, and the souls of the ones who had been stabbed (they mysteriously died to the former man, o. n.), for the word of God, as staying under the altar of the Lamb (Apoc. 6: 9). This is an always increasing glory of the saints.” (Stăniloae 1997: 217)

“Except the canonized saints or the saints who have been imposed as saints to the ecumenical Church’s conscience – represented on the disk by the nine groups – we do not know who amongst the deceased ones are praying for us on earth, or they need our prayers. Maybe in the case of the righteous both variants are true. They are praying for our salvation and we are praying in turn for their glory. On the Eucharistic disk we place the pieces of the leavened bread together for all the deceased ones, righteous, unknown, and sinners.” (Stăniloae 1997: 218)

“A progress in overcoming this formal equality and the external respect it can be achieved - according to us the Christians - on the measure we have Christ and His power within us as source-subject of the endless love. That’s why only the saints give full warmth to their relations with the people, for they have Christ within them in a culminant manner.” (Stăniloae 1997: 249)

“Neither the Saints reckon that they have reached the end of the history, but they too are waiting for the history’s end, in order to live in the pan-human communion in its fullness, through the seen revealing of the glory of Christ and through the activation of the entire His loving of people power.” (Stăniloae 1997: 249)

“The Saint reach, while they are still on earth, in this peace united with the Life. This we can see also on their faces in icons.” (Stăniloae 2005: 234)

“The ascetic images of the Saints, expressing their life of restraint, of detachment from the world, of transcending the world, of self-giving and of self-sacrificing, which shows in an even more accentuated manner, the transcending of the earthly existence, of following to Christ, they help us raising always towards good, to transcend the attachment to the earthly life, to stop ourselves from the evil that connects us to the world’s limited things, to clean ourselves of passions, as the deities and the idols do not do it, because of representing the worldly forces in their contradictory ambiguity. And just through this good which the Saints continuously attract us towards, they attract us towards the godlike life’s transcendent infinity, to the union with it, which they are in, or they call us to transcend our relative, perishing, earthly life. (Stăniloae 2005: 234)

“The ones having Christ and His deeds within them, in an exemplary manner, being filled up with Christ from the past and from their time, they are the Saints. That’s why the Saints’ icons represent the Saints not only in what they had as human in them, but in their quality as dwelling places of Christ while the Saints were still on earth, a quality which they continue having it in an accentuated manner in their present state, in an even greater union with Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005: 237)

“The Saints are the one living the most accentuated the time full with the light of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 167)

“All the more God is present with us, not only as the One Who is omnipresent, but also through His attention directed towards us, which we also feel it, in a way, to the extent of our “spiritual feeling”, which the Church’s Fathers spoke about. The saints, they feel the most the presence of God, even in their live in this life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 209)

Salvation

“The Christian dogmas compose a unity, different from any other unitary system, both by the fact that they present the believer with a infinite development perspective, namely the true salvation, and also by the fact that the power for it and for its perspective, it is really given in Christ, the divine Person, Who is, in the same time, also the man being in communion with the godlike infinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 80)

“In the Eastern Church God is glorified for the gifts He gives to the man, towards man’s deification. The Orthodox East put the accent on the upholding, sheltering, and helping kindness of God (God as escape, as shelter), and encouraging the human aspirations and potentialities, on the trust in these, on respecting the human freedom. The salvation is seen as a new descending of the godlike life within people, as opening the perspective of the people’s full impartation with God, through resurrection and deification.” (Stăniloae 2003: 229)

“Neither the human consubstantiality consists only in the identity of a nature possessed by distanced person; but, in a unique being borne by all the hypostases in solidarity, though some persons are saved by being overwhelmed by the Ghost of Christ, and others aren’t saved.” (Stăniloae 2003: 304-305)

“The Christendom from the West it often had the tendency of referring to the man’s salvation separately from nature. The Eastern Christendom never conceived them separately.” (Stăniloae 2003: 337)

“The fact that our being inscribes an own line of transcending, in its action of actualizing and elevating the contingent world, it shows that the man is, in this action, in relation with God. The man ascends towards God and he is helped in this ascension by God, when the man believes in God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 387)

“The Son of God makes Himself servant of people. The man is served by the smaller ones than him, and by the bigger ones. That’s why the man is the last one to enter the creation. He enters the creation like a master, the inferior creatures having to serve his vital needs and the superior angels having to serve the man’s salvation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 445)

“The connection between the Person of Jesus Christ and His savior work, it is shown by the fact that in the implications of the union of the two natures in His unique Person it is shown His savior work upon His human nature. Thus, one can say that these implications constitute the internal content of His savior acts. His savior acts are a more obvious materialization and a manifestation of these implications.” (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

“We cannot achieve the salvation through deeds committed by whosoever man, who founded a certain institution or who realized an art work, which to have a prolonged effect in a way or another. Jesus Christ Himself saves us, as irreplaceable Person, for His quality of godlike Person Who has become accessible to the man, this quality is the sole source of power which liberates us from sin and from sin’s consequences, amongst which the gravest is the death. We cannot achieve the salvation except from God or by making eternal our relation, as person, with Him, a relation by which are communicated to us and we receive freely the gifts and the powers of the true and inexhaustible life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

“The Person of Christ saves us through a work of transforming us, by committing some transforming deeds, or by making efficient His love through such deeds. So, only Christ as irreplaceable Person can save us, but this is for only He can commit the savior deeds required on this purpose. Between His person and His savior deeds there is an indissoluble bond. The last ones are the conclusion of the first one. Of course, this doesn’t subject Jesus to a natural necessity which would have been inscribed in His person. His Person implies the free engagement of the loving God in working our salvation. By deigning to make, On Himself, man, in order to save us, He implicitly has deigned to go until the end in accomplishing our salvation: he has deigned to go until the end in making out of the assumed humanity an environment of savior power upon us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

“The savior work of Christ is being directed towards the human nature, which He fills it up with His godhead and He liberates the human nature from the affects, from the sufferings, and from the death which are consequences of the ancestral sin. Then, His savior work is also being directed, even through the affects, towards all of us, by participating to the Godhead manifested in the power He is sending to us through His human nature, to liberate us too, from this sinful life from affects, from corruptibility, and from death. But also through this, His savior work is being directed towards God, in order to glorify God through our reconciliation with Him (Ephes. 1: 20: 2: 16), through our liberation from the mentioned evil things, and by dressing us up in the godlike shininess. So, even if there are three directions of the work, the works isn’t, though, divided. The work of reestablishing and deifying the own nature, it is in the same time work of extolling God; this is for in the human nature thus reestablished and deified, it is shown the glory of God, and the nature itself extols God. The glory of God is proven also by the people’s liberation from sin. This is for the people cease to be the enemies of God, once Christ has reconciled them with God, through His body, namely through the godlike powers extended within people through His body; the people can now

“glorify God in their body and in their ghost, a body and a ghost belonging now to God” (I Cor. 6: 20)

“The direction towards people of Christ’s savior work, it isn’t else but extending the savior work upon His human nature. Even in the work upon His human nature it is implied the intention of extending it upon the other people too, and of extolling God by liberating the people from sin and by filling them up with the godlike life from within Himself. The work of Christ is a unitary whole, but its directions, or intentions, they are three. And only by accomplishing these three directions, the savior purpose of His work is being fulfilled.” (Stăniloae 2006: 48)

“Christ saves us for He dwells within us through the Holy Ghost. Through this, Christ irradiated within us, out of His spiritualized body, the power that saves and deifies us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 82)

“If the salvation means the impartation with the godlike life out of the body of Lord Christ and if the grace is just this impartation, then the work of the Ghost of Christ, or the grace, they will be absolutely necessary to us for salvation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 129)

“The term used by the Holy Scripture and by the Church’s Tradition for naming the purpose and the result of the Christ’s work regarding the man, it is that of “salvation”. The paradigm of this word it counts in the New Testament a number of 279 verses it is mentioned in. In the Nicaea-Constantinopolitan Creed the Church confesses that the Son of God embodies Himself, He was crucified, He resurrected himself, He ascended with His body to heavens, and He sits on the right hand of the Father: “for us the people and for our salvation”. Being the fulfiller of this work, Jesus Christ is called with the appellative “The Savior”, the most encountered appellative after that one of “The Lord”. Even the name Jesus means “The Savior”.” (Stăniloae 2006: 138)

“The meanings of the term salvation are told in the New Testament through a multitude of terms, which indicate, in the same time, the phases of the salvation, to its final phase: the resurrection and the eternal life. Behold some of these terms: dying to the sin, with Christ, and the earnest of the resurrection and of the eternal life with Him (Rom. 6: 4-5; 8: 11-12; Col. 3: 1), “the destruction of the sin’s body” and “the liberation from under the sin’s slavery” (Rom. 6: 6-7), the true “life” in Christ for God (Rom. 8, 14, 16, 17, 23; Gal. 4: 7); the perspective of the glory into Christ (Rom. 18: 21); the imprinting of the Christ’s image in the saved one, the resemblance with the Son of God (Rom. 8: 29; Gal. 4: 7; 3: 27); dressing up in Christ (Rom. 8: 4); walking into the renewal of the life (Rom. 4: 4); living into the Ghost, walking into the Ghost (Gal. 5: 24); the quality of limbs of Christ, belonging to His body (I Cor. 12: 27); comprising into the body's clay pot the knowledge of the glory of God (II Cor. 4: 6); new creature into Christ (II Cor. 5: 17); living into the righteousness that is opposes to the lawlessness (II Cor. 6: 14); the communion with the Father and with the Son (I Jn. 1: 2; I Cor. 1: 9); the communion with the Holy Ghost (II Cor. 13: 13); the participation to the godlike life (I. Pt. 1: 4); the coming closer to the Father through Christ (Ephes. 2: 18), household of God (Ephes. 2: 19); stones in the dwelling place of Christ (Ephes. 2: 21-22; I. Pt. 2: 5); rooted and founded in the love of Christ (Ephes. 2: 18); born for the second time not out of corruptible seed, but out of God (I Pt. 1: 23; I Jn. 3: 9) etc." (Stăniloae 2006: 138)

"The man obtains the salvation state by grace, and it is developed through deeds and gifts within Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 138)

"Because of the Judaizers making propaganda amongst Christians in order those ones to understand the salvation as a "justice" obtained by the man himself by fulfilling the deeds ordered by the old law, the problem was: "What the salvation is obtained through?: by organizing the life around a law and by keeping that law's commandments, or by elevating the man to a new mode of existence, which the Apostle called it a new creature, the life into Christ, the adoption, the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heavens,... the together-crucifixion, the together-resurrection with Christ, the dressing up in Christ?" This new mode of life, the only one savior, Saint Apostles Paul called it as "the righteousness from God". This mode of life comes within man in the same time with the faith in Christ and it develops out of this faith, or better said it comes out of Christ as Person, as spring of infinite love and power, and it is not a quality which the man earns it, in haughty isolation, by his deeds. According to Saint Apostle Paul: "the faith in Christ makes the man righteous, just for it is a new life into Christ Who is the Only One Who makes the man alive". This is for only a person gives a certain life to another person; and the Person of Christ - as supreme Person having an infinite life - He is the only one Who communicates the man an imperishable life. This if for through faith, as man's relation with Christ as Person, Christ Himself dwells within man and He is the One Who saves the man, for he makes the man in His image, capable of living a life according to the Ghost and not according to the body (Rom. 8: 29), namely a life in the horizon of infinite life of the Ghost." (Stăniloae 2006: 139)

"Understanding the salvation not as a justification attributed in a juridical manner to the ones who believe in God, or distributed by Church out of the thesaurus of the grace merited by Christ, but like a new life irradiating directly out of the sanctified and resurrected body, in the limbs of the mysterious body of Christ which is the Church, namely as an effect of the believers' communion, as persons, with Christ, so that the salvation no longer has an external, static position, but it is a man's new quality in continuous development." (Stăniloae 2006: 141)

"The Christians' life was seen by Saint Apostle Paul, generally, as an orderly running towards the crown of the eternal and endless into Christ life. And the running is on one hand, domination upon the passions, and on the other hand it is a work out of the work of Christ, an impartation with Christ's love: "Don't you know that the ones who run on stadium, all of them run, but not all of them take the crown? You, run so to take it... Therefore, I run so, not as not knowing towards what; I struggle, not as punching the air, but I restrain my body and I refrain my body, lest while heralding to others, I myself to become untried" (I Cor. 9: 24-27), "but to become partaker" with Christ (I Cor. 9: 23; see also II Tim. 4: 6-8)." (Stăniloae 2006: 142)

"The Holy Fathers presented in diverse modes the spiritual ascension in Christ. We have such descriptions at: Saint Gregory of Nyssa, Maximos the Confessor, John Climacus, Simeon the New Theologian, Nicholas Kabasilas, Kallistos and Ignatius, and others."

"The preparation for the man's rebirth or for the Christ's dwelling within man, or for the grace's dwelling within man, it has diverse forms. The preparation of the ones who were baptized on the day of the descent of the Holy Ghost, it started through the word of Saint Peter, who made Christ known. This word cased within them "the pricking of the heart" and the desire of being saved by attaching themselves to Christ. To repent their life from until them they were urged by Saint Apostle Paul too (Acts 2: 37-38). Their question: "What have we to do?" it came out of their awakened conscience that without Christ there is no escape for them from the perspective of the eternal death. Only after that they were baptized." (Stăniloae 2006: 144)

"Saul's preparation was caused by the unmediated apparition of Christ, and it continued through prayer and through the connection Saul established with Ananias, a disciple of the Apostles (Acts chapter 9). The eunuch of the Queen from Ethiopia, he felt the need to be baptized, through the word of Deacon Philip, who awakened within him the faith in Christ. Both Saul and the eunuch were baptized consequently to that preparation." (Stăniloae 2006: 144)

"Even the Apostles prepared themselves for receiving the Holy Ghost by spending three years of time nigh to Jesus and through the prayer for ten days in the upper room from Jerusalem." (Stăniloae 2006: 145)

“The man’s rebirth in Christ or the Christ’s dwelling within the man, it is a spiritual event produced through the Mystery of the Baptism and it equals to the man’s entrance in the mysterious body of Christ, or in the Church. This spiritual event consists, on one hand, of the abolishment of the ancestral sin and of the other sins committed because of the weakness maintained within the soul by the power of the ancestral sin; on the other hand, this spiritual even consists of the dwelling of Christ or of the grace within the man’s soul, and this equals to the starting of a new life within man. The walls of the spiritual prison have been crumbled down and the man has entered the circuit of the Christ’s endless love, love manifested in the communion of the Church. Now the Ghost of Christ Has introduced Himself intimately in the human subject, with His work, so that the human subject feels the impulse towards the union with Christ in love and towards deeds of love as an impulse of his own, though this impulse belongs it comes to the man out of Christ; and the contrary temptation the man feels it as stirred up in front of the soul by an unseen enemy.” (Stăniloae 2006: 145)

“God has a cosmic plan for salvation – He doesn’t save spiritual individual monads. The man cannot fulfill this unique mission of his except in his body engaged in this world. That’s why, the Son of God Himself made Himself man composed of body and soul, in order to gather, through His humanity, the whole creation in Him. Then, how could have been the man consummated if he had been a spiritual person who hadn’t acted upon the world, who hadn’t strengthened himself as spirit, with the help of God, in relation with the seen world? Then, only in this life the man has needy fellow humans who he can help through his body. Saint John Damascene said: “If the market has ended, there won’t be bought and sold goods anymore. For, where will then the poor people be? Where, the doings of the good will they be? Before that moment, we can help one another and we can offer to the Loving-of-people-God the manifestations of the love amongst brothers.” (Stăniloae 1997: 166-167)

“Besides, neither to the Holy Fathers it totally lacks the accent placed on the value of the repentance before death, not to mention the insistence which they accentuate with, the importance of the repentance during the whole life. Thus, by and large, they make the eternal happiness as depending on the good and clean deeds, on the virtues which, as repeated clean and good deeds, they are inscribed into the soul as habits, as traits of the image resembling to Christ, as permanent openings of the soul towards the communion with Christ and with the fellow humans, but also depending on the repentance during the whole life, or at least at the end of the life, which kills the former callous man of the sin, of the egotism, and gives birth to the new man, that one of the communion with Christ. According to Saint John Damascene, it is decisive in what disposition the soul exist this life: introverted in the egotism of the pleasures and of the pride or open to the assertive desire towards the communion with Christ, with the conviction that only He is the happiness. That's why, the repentance from the end of the life, as desire for the communion with Christ, it brings the salvation, as, inversely, the falling off the communion with Christ, through sins against Him, in brings the perdition to the one who has strived the whole his life for virtue." (Stăniloae 1997: 192)

"As long the sinner moved on earth amongst the people who didn't know him, he still has the possibility of at least mimic a dialogue with somebody, because not everybody knew his callous insincerity. Now he falls in the loneliness of the desertions and of being forgotten by everybody, in the opposite extreme of the communion. This is what the hell consists of. While the people still are on earth, there is a process which each person can achieve his salvation in, some giving, others receiving, for salvation, prayers and good deeds, namely callings and answers, in a vast and multiple dialogue carried on amongst people and between people and God, giving and receiving not only them, the people, but also God, and that's why the ones giving and receiving they benefit hundredfold." (Stăniloae 1997: 297)

"Why the mission of saving the people it falls right to the Son? The Son lives only with His sight looking towards the Father, and not wanting anything else but to fulfill the Father's will, to serve the Father. And He wants to be as much as possible subject to the love of the Father, to live for the Father, with His sight aimed towards the Father, fulfilling the Father's will. Thereby, the Son wants the largest possible number of sons of the Father, of His brothers. He fulfills the will of the Father at the Creation. But, because the created people do not raise at the divine subjects' height, and they fall into a tormented existence, the Son intervene again to fulfill the will of the Father, by restoring the people in a report of sons. It falls to the Son to fulfill this work through creation and through salvation too, because He is in the role of the doer of Father's will, and He – the Son – must come closer, in a special way, to the ones who must resemble Him. In fact, the human subjects bear in their being and in their meaning, in a special way, the likeness of the Son and of His relation like a listener and venerator of God.

In addition to these, the Son is called by John the Evangelist, The Word. But, by the fact he gave this name to a person, namely to a person who does not live into the loneliness of the contemplation, but into the report of the communication, he indicated that he hasn't understood, through The Word, only the meaning, the impersonal idea, which can be discovered by anyone in things without being communicate to him, and he didn't exclusively understand a general concept which God cogitates it eternally, and that He incorporates all the things He creates in it, and us having to discover it. The Word (the sense) discovered thereby through our mind, it would not be a proper Revelation, but the actualization of something that is in our mind. Our intellect, capable by its own efforts, after an evolution time, to find by itself what God thinks and to comprise exactly like Him, it would not differ essentially from the one of God. From here to the identification of the human intellect to the divine one, it is only a step, and the so-called Revelation becomes inutile.

In reality is about a Word as Person which the Son of God unveils to us through Revelation. It is a word which we cannot bring out or find it out with our human mind. This Word is beyond any height which the human intellect can raise to. But it is beyond, not as meaning, because if this has been the case it would have been given to us to be incorporate into our memory and then we could have fulfilled by ourselves what it comprises in it. We would have been, furthermore, under the regime of the ancient law. It is beyond, into the meaning that through this Word God Himself is nigh to us, close not like sense, because then we would have been alone ourselves, but like a Person, like a Subject who limits us, like a supreme reality different from us, Who scatters our loneliness and forces us to ascertain it and to take attitude.

In fact, the primordial meaning of the word it is that of manifestation of one person towards another one, in what is not physical reality, identical to the world of the things, but like a spiritual subject. The word is the main and always present mean and instrument of any communication between persons. The word supposes always two persons. The word is a dialog even when a person keeps silent, because through silence that person involves, and upholds the word of another one. The one who speaks realizes that: the other one answers him inside, the other one takes attitude. Even a professor who speaks about who knows what insect, at his desk, if he hadn't an auditorium which he knows about that it follows him in what he is saying, he would not have the appetite to speak. The speaking of the man in loneliness it is an illusory placing into a state of quasi-community: he imagines what he would say, what he would have told, what he will say when he will have a person or another in front of him.

The word, in its full meaning, it is not a senses exposure for the impersonal world, but the impartation of an attitude towards other persons, it is the affirmation of the man like a subject in order to prepare, if hasn't accomplished the communion immediately. The man feels the need that to be regarded as a subject by another, to notice that he is not a simple object and so to predispose the other one to grant him a more attentive consideration.

These calls of the man towards another man they use the reasons exposure, precisely in the shown goal. Not the sense itself is the focusing point, but its subject and the attention to the other.

The Greek thinking detached the meaning from its personal duality in which it has always been, from the me-you dialog, from its purpose to serve, in the concrete historical instant, the communion between two or more people, by taking him like a temporal and impersonal reality, like something to what does not meet its sense ever. And it connected the term: "word" – Logos – to the so understood sense.

The Word, however, like shows it also the Greek name Logos, which comes from Λέγω, I say, it means directly always through speaking, namely intentional manifestation of a person towards another one. The word it is the vehicle of the communion, the bridge between persons like subjects. The word expresses the conscious intentionality of a person towards communion, being in the same time the instrument through which is awakened and attracted the other one. And, whereas the person is in principal mode intentionality towards communion, and the word his expression, we can tell that the person is word. Interior word, in tension, until expresses himself, and exterior word when the person expresses himself. The exterior word starts from the interior word, and this one cannot but to prolong itself to exterior. The person is word, a provocative word, an awakening word to another person by attracting that person into communion.

By the fact that God is named not “a word” but “The Word”, it is showed that He is not a person among other persons, but The Person by excellence. In Him the Person is accomplished on a supreme degree, namely the intentionality towards communion and, through this, the awakening power of subjects and dragging them into a communion report. The word, being the supreme way which a person imposes himself to us through, like a presence, narrowing the mystifier selfishness of any other reality except the self, the word being consequently the supreme means of revelation of the most intensive and non-cancellable reality, namely of the person, by the fact that the Son of God is named thereby, it is shown that He has, from the Persons of the Holy Trinity, the role of revealing God to people. He is particularly the subject of the Revelation.

We acknowledge that, through these emphases, it has been shown rather that the Son of God is named The Word, because He has received the special role of God's revelation and of people's salvation, rather than this nomination would represent an own situation in inter-Trinitarian reports, considered in themselves. But, besides the general indication that the roles which are assumed by the Trinitarian Persons towards outside have an explanation, a supposition, in Their eternal existence, it is hard to tell something in this respect, because the Revelation does not illuminate us. We dare not to affirm that also in internal godlike life, the Son especially represents the intentionality towards communion. We can attribute Him the mission of Revelation, because the whole ecclesiastical tradition attempts to see in Him, the One through Whom the Father looks at Himself, the One Who reflects the splendor of the Father (Jew. 1, 3), though this is a different kind of revelation than the so-called one: through this revelation the Father knows Himself, but proper to revelation it is to know something else than your person. It is probably that between these two revelations there still is a bond, even it is harder to see it. On one hand, the Son, who manifests the Father, the glory of His brightness, He will reveal the Father's glory also to the people, through His revelation. The Father is the Hidden One, He is the not-revealed One, and only the Son has access to the Father, but the Son knows and confesses and mirrors the Father. Ontologically, to the creature it is impossible to notice the Hidden, the Indeterminable, and the Ultimate Cause of everything. Only the Son gives word towards Him. The Son is thereby the Trinity's Word.

On the other hand, the Father does not look only at Himself into the Person of the Son, but He also looks at the Son's Person." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Applying to the concrete development of the historical life, the things we said, by and large, about the leading of the world, by Jesus Christ, towards the target of its transfiguration. into the eschatological union with God, and by considering the mentioned distinction between the kingly function of God, like Maker and Upholder, and between these functions of His like Savior, we can better understand the destination of the history and the mixing of diverse plans which compose the history.

The supreme target of the history is the salvation. The history makes sense only in the light of this target has." (Stăniloae 1993)

"One cannot cogitate anything higher than the state of the Resurrected Christ: a salvation conceived otherwise than reaching His state it won't any longer be a salvation in Christian sense. The savior state has been achieved in Christ-the Man through divine acts; and therefore, we conceive our salvation as an overflowing out of His state, in us." (Stăniloae 2005: 19)

"The iconoclasts spoke about an "incomprehensible image" of Christ after His Ascent, about an image that cannot be painted. But what could this image be? Asked the icons' defenders. Such an image no longer could even be called as image. And if Christ no longer has an image, He won't have even a body, were saying the icon's defenders. By this, the iconoclasts were denying the working power of Christ right at the time of His descent. This is for it has no positive effect upon the body. If this working power wasn't shown in bringing the image, or the human nature, to its original beauty, then nothing would be shown, or it would be shown in destroying the human nature. The salvation has, in this case, a negative meaning. Itself the descent of the Son of God it becomes, by this, purposeless; or its meaning would have consisted of destroying the human body and image, of His own image. But the working godlike power descended to the work of reestablishing and beautifying His human image, as His working godlike power descended at the man's creation at the beginning. In this, Patriarch Nicephorus saw the purpose of the kenosis of the Son of God. The salvation consists of this, and not in providing God a juridical satisfaction on behalf of us." (Stăniloae 2005: 178)

"Being the Mediator for people it means being from amongst them according to the human nature, but also being different according to the godlike nature, but still One and the Same. This is because if He hadn't been different from people, if had been totally one with them, He wouldn't have been a Mediator, for in such a case a Mediator wouldn't have been necessary. In such a case the salvation would have been done mechanically, and not by consenting to it and by making personal efforts for it; or, there wouldn't have been salvation because the human persons would have been annulled." (Stăniloae 2005: 204)

"The light which will be irradiating from Christ in the future age, willing all of us up with light, or making all of us light, it won't annul our bodies, but the light which our bodies will be see in, it will make the space not to be perceived any longer. Christ will be seen, and the saints' bodies will be seen, but they no longer will see one another as being at distance from each other. The light will overcome the space but without abolishing the persons who are communicated through light. In the future life we will feel Christ in each man, and that will consummate the way we were feeling Christ during our life on earth. If the ones who did good deeds to others, they saw Christ present within them, and they were enlightened by that (Mt. 25: 40), in the future life they will see Christ totally clearly, in His light, while the ones who didn't do good deeds to others, because they didn't see Christ in them, and because they lived in darkness, they will fall in the total darkness in the future life. But the one who prayed much, while he was here, to Christ, and who saw Christ within himself lighting in his heart, as the hesychasts do, that one will fully see Christ with himself in his full of light future life." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 205)

"The birth of the Son of God as man, out of Virgin, it has elevated the mankind to the maximum union with God, and it has given the death received by Him a savior character, for He didn't endure it for His sin, namely out of necessity, and therefore He defeated the death. Through His birth out of Virgin, Christ showed Himself as godlike Person Who has assumed the human nature, and through this quality He raises above the general law of the people's birth out of the union between a man and a woman, and He defeated the law of the definitive death. And through the unity of nature with the people, He has saved the people from the definitive death. Through this, Christ has brought the most important light in the mankind's existence submitted to the lack of meaning, by enduring a law which, in this case, it would be inexplicable in its origin and in its meaning." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 209)

"The embodied God-the Word, tried to heal and to escape our nature ill because of disorder - and consequently to escape our nature from the death coming from that disorder, through the separation of our nature from God the source of the life -, not only through our words which He directly appropriated, but also by elevating our nature from the sin by assuming Himself our nature, out of the Virgin, and by defeating the death, as One Who received the death without being guilty of any sin. The human nature couldn't receive this saved state from the other persons, without the communication with the embodied Word and without the light brought by Him through His savior deeds, through the example, through the power, and through the words of His.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 42)

“Our Savior indicated not only the salvation as final target of the human being – and the salvation as being one with the communication with God and with the people – but also some concrete modes which the human being can reach this happiness through. All of them are modes of loving openness of our heart towards our fellow human. Through these, the human being sees God and he opens himself to God. Even if some of these modes seem to indicate a direct report with God, though, neither in them, the human beings’ encounter with God, in the love, it isn’t separated from the encounter with the people, in the love. And even if some of these modes seem to indicate that the human being who loves the people, he finds his happiness in encountering the beloved person, not being mentioned about God, the loving encounter with the beloved person it isn’t outside the encounter with God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 134)

“Christ started His savior work by starting to defeat in Himself the affects consequent to the ancestral sin, affects manifested within all of us, and which he took upon Himself too. That’s why he went firstly into wilderness, detaching Himself from the world’s temptations. This is for He took our hunger too, he took our tiredness too, and He took also the humiliation felt by the ones who are oppressed and despised, but he defeated all of these, by showing this during the whole His life. Only at the end, after the teaching given about Him and after showing by example the life the people must live, He defeated the death too, as the worst consequence of the sin, out of solidarity with us. This shows us that we can fight too, after our Baptism, the consequences of the ancestral sin, in order to defeat them and in order to defeat even the death, by receiving it with the faith that we won’t definitively remain in death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 178)

“We are given the power for liberating us from under all the slaveries, including that of the death, by the Holy Ghost of Christ, through Baptism; the Ghost being not only of Christ-God, but also of Christ-the New Man.” (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

“The Word of God liberates us from the body’s death, not by physically defeating it, Himself remaining outside it, or Himself even appropriating it, but by firstly defeating the death with within the human soul which He has assumed together with the human body. The Word or the hypostatical Rationality of God, by assuming, within Himself, our humanity, He has opened to our humanity, again, its thirst and the non-losable possibility of knowing an infinite content of His, and of communicating with Him, as divine hypostatical Rationality, in eternal dialogue with the Father.

This gave the Christ's human soul the power to defeat the corruption of the body, and by that, the power to defeat the death, through inside resurrection." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 27)

"Only the One Who brought the man to existence out of nothing, only Him was able to bring the man back again, from the man's sliding towards nothingness. That's why, the Son of God, by making Himself man, He received, through His sacrifice, the encounter with the nothingness into the human being, in order to defeat it, by transforming the extreme weakness, brought to the man by his separation from God, in an act of Self-giving of His as man, to God." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 27)

"The fact that we are created for the eternity of the plenary life into God and for the communion with others, and the fact that quenching the thirst for communion, inscribed within our nature, it depends on us too, it is shown in our unconditional responsibility for ourselves and for our fellow humans, a responsibility which we feel though, while being still in the life in the material body, that we are preparing ourselves even from here, for that life." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 73)

"To the extent each person has highlighted the greatness of Christ within world, all of them will walk into the light of Christ and in His love, for eternity." (Stăniloae 1995: 174)

"Of course, the history of the salvation isn't composed only of supra-natural acts, because of not being they, at their turn, uninterrupted, as neither is uninterrupted the supra-natural Revelation of God. Though, they have an ascendant spiritual succession, and in this sense, they have a history representing the history of the salvation." (Stăniloae 2003: 38)

"The salvation, into the full meaning, Jesus obtains it from God and He imparts us with it just through the hierarchical dignity." (Stăniloae 1993)

"God has made Himself not only one of our fellow humans but He has made Himself as a poor fellow human of ours. But He showed Himself to us, also as being strong, by strong into the Holy Ghost, and not from material or social points of view. He showed Himself to us as a poor bearer of our helplessness, in order Him to awake us through both of these, by imposing us, as God, our responsibility for the human being given in our care, not only for helping him, but also for our salvation." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 78)

Sanctification

“By turning back to God, the gift of the nature processed through the ascesis of our labor, by imprinting the cross in the things, we sanctify the things, we remove their character of easy pleasures, and we sanctify ourselves.” (Stăniloae 2003: 359)

“About His sanctification through the sacrifice for us, out of His love, Christ Himself has spoken before His passions, showing that He has wanted to stretch this sanctification upon the Church: “And I sanctify Myself for them, for they to be too, sanctified into truth” (Jn. 17: 19). And Saint Apostle Paul said: “Through a sole bringing, He has eternally consummated the ones who are being sanctified” (Hebr. 10: 14). Or: “Christ has loved His Church and He has Given Himself for it, by cleaning it up in the bath of the water through Word, in order to present it to Himself as glorified Church, no having stain or wrinkle or anything like these, but in order to be holy and without blemish” (Ephes. 5: 25-27; compare also: I Cor. 6: 11; I Thess. 4: 3). Saint Paul made here a tight connection between Christ’s love and His sacrifice and the sanctification of the Church through His sacrifice. And about extending within us the holiness of Christ, we who believe in Him and who are united within Church, the Holy Scripture mentions it in several places. The first sanctification of the ones who believe in Christ it takes place at baptism, through which they are united with Christ and to one another within Church. This is for in Baptism “they have been washed up (of sins, of egotism), they have been sanctified, they have been corrected in the name of Lord Jesus Christ and in to the Ghost our God” (I Cor. 6: 11). Then, by living under the power of the grace, the ones who have been baptized they form “an imperial priesthood, a holy nation, a people gained to God” (I. Pt. 2: 9). All the ones who belong to Christ they are “called saints” (Rom. I: 7, I Cor. 1: 2), “saints into Christ Jesus” (Phil. 1: 1), “sanctified in Christ Jesus” (I Cor. 1: 2 etc.). Christ, by dwelling the Church with His sanctified human nature, the Church is saint and sanctifier, having within the source of the grace and of the gifts. The Church is obtaining the grace and the gift, in the same time, through prayer, for the same source is in the same time above the Church, in quality as its Head, as the Church’s ultimate Head, who has no other head, being Himself the ultimate source of the holiness and of love. The Church is holy for in its prayer there is the Holy Ghost, Who prays powerfully, and that why the Church’s obtains the Holy Ghost in an increased degree, the Holy Ghost Who “sanctifies all the things” which the people who believe are imparted with, and Who sanctifies the believers too, within Church, by even more coagulating them as Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 114)

“The Church is the laboratory the Holy Ghost makes us saint in, or he makes us the fuller image of Christ, in Who is concentrated like in a Person the holiness and the love of the Holy Trinity. The Holy Ghost does this by maintaining us, in the same time, preoccupied with actively obtaining the holiness. The main occupation the Church has is to sanctify its members, for they can be saved only thus. The Holy Ghost works for sanctifying the believers within Church, for the Church's life is imprinted with the sanctified body of Christ, for the Church wear His body in its bosom and out of Christ's body irradiates the Holy Ghost. The Church works for this sanctification of its members for it maintains them all in the movement of the love and of the communion with one another." (Stăniloae 2006: 114)

"The will, which has detached itself from the temptation of the sliding into sins, it has died with Christ, to the sin, and it has been resurrected with Him to a new life. But this mortification towards sin and the new life, they must continue out of the power of Christ and of His life, through the man's progress into holiness; they must continue while attracting the human nature too, or the human nature's habits, in this mortification and in this new life. "Therefore, I am urge you, brothers, to present your bodies as a living, saint, and well-pleasing sacrifice, to God" (Rom. 12: 1)" (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

"By gathering themselves as Church, the ones who believe in One and the Same Christ, they are sanctified out of the sanctified humanity of Christ. They are sanctified through the Church's Holy Mysteries which they are united with Christ through, by receiving the grace, of His uncreated work." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 213-214)

"The human being encounters the Bringer of Happiness God, in his heart, since here, for His soul has encounter God, since here, through the people whom he showed his love to. And the happiness he has within his soul, it is poured over his face, and he overcomes the hardships and the pains which he is submitted to." (Stăniloae 1995: 135)

"Wanting to create the man as a being who, though composed of body and soul, he is capable of unitarily comprising, both the spiritual plan up to God and the visible-material plan of the reality, God created the man with a nature which by being assumed by His Son, He can comprise through it, in the most intimate mode, in Himself, the whole His creation: God created the man with a nature through which, like His Son embodied as Man, to be the whole creation made to him, as his own. In union with Christ, the man himself, by seeing the whole sensitive creation as transfigured and hypostatized in Him, he can transfigure and hypostatize the creation in himself. While the man can place on the material things a spiritual seal, by knowing them with his spirit through his body, God-the Word places the godlike seal itself on the world He sees through His body. And this divine seal can be placed also by the man who is united with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 43)

Science

“The idolatry is the cult of the creation, or of a false divinity. Of course, the idolater’s world is different from the world as known by the Christian. It is a world full of mysterious forces, which still are immanent to that world. It is a world with fictive aspect. This fictive aspect has been scattered away by science. But before science, it was scattered away by Christendom, and this made the science possible. It was scattered away by the Holy Fathers, when they said that the deities as modes of the world, they were a fiction. That’s why they said that the Christendom’s world is one with the modern science’s world. The world of the modern science coincides to the Christian world only when seen by a believer. If it is seen by a non-believer, it will be, as well, appreciated in an idolater manner, being dressed up with the attributes of the absolute. So, the world of the modern science can receive an idolater aspect too. Of course, it is about an idolater aspect differing from the pagan idolatry. We deal here with a non-religious idolatry. This aspect is seen within world by the man who reckons the world as the unique reality, and who attributes the world infinity and unlimited power, of course manifested in determinable laws.” (Stăniloae 2005: 89-90)

“Palamas affirmed that the wisdom provided by the profane sciences it is inferior to the wisdom directly given by God to the prophets, as there would be the light of a candle in comparison to the light of the sun.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 27)

“The universe is a reality able to satisfy the bodily needs of the human beings and, as such, it urges us to research its resources which these needs can be satisfied, in order to continuously find in universe new resources able to satisfy constantly new needs. And right through that, the universe can become an increasingly wonderful transparent environment to the untold rich God Who has shown His power and His imagination in wonderfully matching the universe to the multiple human needs. Researching the universe, on the purpose of finding the new resources corresponding to new needs and in order to adapt those resources to those needs, it determines the birth and the development of the science and of the technique, but these ones too, they help to be seen even in more detailed the great wisdom of God Who has placed in his creation so many energies and means corresponding to the human being’s needs. This conformity of the universe to the human being’s bodily needs, and, thus, the Creator’s wisdom, they are shown in universe even before the nature’s resources are concretely known. The human being sees even before knowing the concrete details, in universe, the God’s wisdom in the fact that the suns provide the energy necessary to life, and that there are so many environments able to sustain life. The Palmist could say, based on this experience and on general observations upon the good order of the universe: “How much has grown

Your things, Lord! You have made everything wisely!" (Ps. 103: 25²³³)."
(Stăniloae 1995: 121)

"The human being is aware of the fact that the science and the craftsmanship cannot produce him new sources of food, but they only discover the sources already given through creation and they can adapt those sources to be more easily accessible to the human beings. The contemporary science and technique have discovered new energy sources, and they unveiled new ways of quickly traveling the universe. The universe is unveiled, increasingly more, as consisting of useful energies. By discovering new hidden facilities of the nature, the human being will be increasingly easier present at great distances, being shown the fact that to his aspiration of exceeding the space and the time with his being, and with his senses, there correspond forces helping him to be present with his power, even by now, at great distance and to make his image last forever."
(Stăniloae 1995: 122)

"The human being can reckon himself as master of the entire universe in a very real sense, for each human being can be everywhere in space, during his time, and having the entire universe as his body. In the possibility of actualizing through the cosmos's energies, some powers which are greater than the strict needs for satisfying the need for food, it is shown that the universe is called towards increasing the human being's spiritual powers, or mainly to this. This is for in this power given to the man to be, to some extent, present in the whole space, it is anticipated a fully spiritual presence of the man in the whole universe, in the life to come." (Stăniloae 1995: 122)

"The one who judges right, he sees that the victory upon space, through spirit, it is, though, of another nature than that eased by the physical energies of the universe. It is something else to see with your eyes, things from far away, or to hear somebody's voice from far away, but without technical means and through the spirit's strength. You can find out somebody's pain by talking to him over the phone and you can comfort him. But it is something else when your body has become, through the strength of your spirit, irradiating at distance, or perceiving the things happening at distance. It is something else to become, in the whole universe, as an internal presence, as in a reality which the powers of the human spirit are extended within. It is something else to directly communicate your power to others - than through technical means. Jesus shook the earth when He was suffering on the cross, and He healed illnesses by His commandment only. The presence through spirit at distance, it is the sign of a transcending of the material universe done by the living human being, with the whole entirety of his powers, as it isn't the sending at distance of a word through technical means. In this power of the spirit, of working at distance, it is obviously shown the exceeding of the universe's borders through the whole living human being. But this can be done by the human being only when he is filled up with the godlike Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 122)

²³³ In KJB we have Ps. 104: 24 (E. l. t.'s n.): "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all:".

"But the cosmos and the man constitute a natural Revelation also from the point of view of the knowledge. The cosmos is organized corresponding to our capacity of knowing." (Stăniloae 2003: 10)

Seeing God

“The Holy Fathers unanimously declare that like the eye won’t be able see the physical light and the things from within if it doesn’t have in itself that light too, likewise our spirit won’t be able to see the godlike light and the realities from within it except if it has in himself this light.” (Stăniloae 1997: 246)

“The culminant state of the spiritual life it is the state of the believer elevated above the level of his powers, not by himself, but by the work of the Holy Ghost. “Our mind goes out of itself and so it is united with God, by becoming above mind”, says Saint Gregory Palamas. This is because of the mind not being able to see what it sees “only by the fact that it has the mental feeling, likewise the man’s eye too it would be incapable to see without an external sensitive light and differing from it”, says the same Gregory Palamas. While it is seeing God, the mind goes beyond itself and all of its mental works receive a work of God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 7)

“By excluding the two impossible extremes: the total separation from God and the identification to Him, it remains that our report with Him to be developed on the one of long length of a real bond, of a contact that, by starting from the encounter through the spiritual energy of the attention, it might reach the “face to face” sight.” (Stăniloae 1992: 22)

“Saint Gregory Palamas, beside the negative theology which still is an intellectual operation, for the mind thinks at the notions it removes and it is in the same time carried by the evidence that God is more than the removed notions – he knows about one more apophatic state of the soul, before the soul coming to the holy light. It is a state being born during prayer, when the soul leaves all the thought related to the things, and it gets out of himself. But this exiting (or ecstasy) still doesn’t mean seeing the light. It is therefore a lived apophatism, experienced in a much more intensive degree than that staying at the basis of the mental operation which removes from God the positive attributes.” (Stăniloae 1992: 197)

“Unlike Barlaam, who sustained that seeing the godlike light it isn’t a negative theology, and therefore the negative theology represents the supreme level of the spiritual ascension, Saint Gregory Palamas said: “This above mind work it is superior to the work in the frame of the mind; they do not see God, but not in the sense that they do not see anything, as do the ones who cogitate God by negation, but they see through the sight itself what it is above seeing” (Palamas, The Romanian Philokalia, volume VII, p. 306 (head 26)). This is for “the ones who occupy themselves with the most-blessed sight, not by negation but by seeing in Ghost, they know what exceeds the sight, by this deifying work” (idem, p. 307).” (Stăniloae 1992: 197)

“The negative theology is only an anticipative icon of the seeing of the godlike light, but it still isn’t that light itself.” (Stăniloae 1992: 199)

“Saint Gregory Palamas subtly discerned between seeing, from outside, the darkness which God veils Himself in, for the human mind working above its powers, and penetrating the interior of that darkness by the fact that the mind is attracted there by God Himself. The first one is the negative theology and it could say, at most, that the darkness which God inhabits in, it is at its turn beyond any things’ images and concepts.” (Stăniloae 1992: 200)

“The negative theology is something else than seeing the godlike light, namely an inferior level to that. Likewise, between the negative theology and seeing the godlike light there is an intermediary apophatism, experienced in an existential mode by the whole our being, in a culminant state of the prayer, as feeling God in darkness and as total silence of the mind too. The first two states could be reached by man through his natural powers, helped, of course, by the grace received at Baptism and in the Mystery of the Holy Chrism. Through them, the mind reaches close to the precipice that separates the mind’s knowledge from God, but still is on this side, on the human realm. But when the mind is kidnapped by God, the mind crosses beyond, at seeing the godlike light. Of course, seeing the godlike light still is accompanied by an apophatism, which we could call it as of third degree. But this is no longer an apophatism in the sense of void, as the two previous ones. This apophatism consists, on one hand, of the conscience of the one who sees that light that that light cannot be comprised in concepts or expressed in words, and on the other hand, it consists of the conscience that above that light there is the divine Being Who remains totally inaccessible, and that the accessible light itself remains an infinite reserve. But the godlike light has a positive content of knowledge above knowledge, of apophatic knowledge, of experience and of feeling above the natural experience and feeling.” (Stăniloae 1992: 200-201)

“Seeing the godlike light, it represents the kidnapping of the mind through the godlike light beyond the precipice between us and God, so that the mind is no longer of this realm from here – namely of the natural knowledge - but on that realm from beyond.” (Stăniloae 1992: 201)

“Another reason highlighting the positive role of the mind in the union with God, in seeing the godlike light, it is the fact that the mind doesn’t receive from the beginning the same godlike light, but seeing that light it is a ceaseless process. This fact must depend on an endless widening of the mind’s power of seeing, of comprising, of impropriating the ever-higher understanding dwelling within mind as godlike work. We would say that if function is from above, but the subject of the function is, together with God, the mind. This means that not the human subject or organ produces this function, but this function comes from above, but the organ must previously be prepared, and to always grow up through its natural function, in order to be able to handle with more functional power what comes from above. According to the Holy Fathers the mind's report with the godlike light is analogue to the report between eye and sunlight, which it cannot see without, but in order to receive it the eye must be capable of, and in this sense the eye must be trained and it must continue training on the measure the eye receives the sunlight in an increasing quantity." (Stăniloae 1992: 279)

"What is the godlike light unveiled to the mind that reached the last levels of the prayer?

That light is, from one point of view, just the smiling irradiation of the divine love, lived in a more intensive form during the moments of ecstatic focusing towards God." (Stăniloae 1992: 279-280)

"On the supreme level of the clean prayer, there appears the godlike light, a fact whose experience is described by the people who live it. That's why, the love for God, the knowledge, and the light, are presented to us always as being in a tight connection. Sometimes the Holy Fathers speak only about two of these factors, but there always is presupposed the third factor too. Behold, for instance, a place from Saint Maximos the Confessor, where he spoke only about love and about the godlike light: "When the mind, carried away by the love's eros, it leaves from within itself towards God, it no longer knows either about itself or about any other thing from amongst the existing things. This is for the mind being lightened by the godlike and infinite light, it no longer perceived the things created by Him, like the material eye no longer sees the stars when the sun starts raising up" (Cap. De Char., I, 10; G.P. 90, 964). But just from here one can notice that the light which he spoke about it is knowledge in the same time, for its apparition is like the sun's apparition that makes the stars no longer possible to be perceived; in other words, while the mind is absorbed by the seeing of God, it no longer sees the created things." (Stăniloae 1992: 280)

"The light is knowledge in the same time, and the light of the knowledge it is the fruit of the love. But a light of a knowledge that springs out of love, which isn't else but an expression of the state of love, it is life in the same time." (Stăniloae 1992: 280)

"The mind on its road towards itself, through prayer, when looking at itself it directly intuits the closeness of God. And then, the mind stops for a moment, amazed, from any activity; later, the divine love descending from above as a fire upon a sacrifice and passively placed as on a altar in front of the unseen God, it kidnaps the mind out of itself and it takes the mind beyond the darkness wall which hides God from the people as long as their mind advances only by its efforts. The mind which no longer sees even on itself, and which now works not by its work but exclusively by the godlike work, it has penetrated the zone of the godlike light irradiating from the inward bosom of the divine Subject, or of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1992: 281)

“While during the prayer the mind is still aware of itself as somehow separated from God, and it doesn’t see God, but it only feels His presence in shadow, as the One Whose grace the mind’s own subject exists through, in other words, while during the prayer the mind sees directly on itself and only indirectly sees God, once it is kidnaped out of itself it sees God directly and it is no longer is aware of itself. This is the experience of the love during the ecstasy moments: I am no longer seeing myself but I only see you; you are taking, in the horizon of my sight, the place of my own self. Actually, the godlike like is considered as being a reflection of the loving face of God, or of the faces who love each other and loves us, of the Holy Trinity. Where one can see light, there God is no longer covered in shadow, His presence is no longer only suspected, but He has unveiled His face which irradiates the light. “The light of His glory, said Saint Simeon the New Theologian, it goes before His face and it is impossible that He to appear otherwise than in light. The ones who haven’t seen this light, they haven’t seen God, for God is light” (Homily LXXIX, 2).” (Stăniloae 1992: 282)

“Neither the mind’s getting out of itself is a so-called an existential one. This getting out means that the mind no longer looks at itself directly, but it intensely looks beyond itself. Some kind of mind’s getting out of itself, it is the looking at the external objects too. But while this last one is a getting outside, the first one is getting out of itself while still remain inside. This last getting out means that the mind doesn’t lock itself up in self-contemplation. But this means also forsaking its natural work and replacing it for the godlike work. This getting out in both senses it is achieved in the union of the mind with the godlike light seen by the mind. By seeing through the light of the divine love descended in the mind, and by looking at that light coming out of God and reflected upon and within mind, this fills the mind up by making it light too. The one who looks at a light that irradiates on the face of the beloved one he is filled up with that light too. The light and the brightness from the face of the beloved one extends also on the face of the one who loves, engulfing both of them in a common light and joy, which, in time, by being imprinted in their looks and in their traits, it makes them alike.” (Stăniloae 1992: 284-285)

“The mind sees the godlike light not only beyond itself, but it sees it also within itself. From beyond the mind that light extends within mind too. Only the mind’s intention must be to look not at itself but at something that is above mind and beyond mind, in order to be able to see that one even in itself. We would say that while the mind was looking at itself, it was directly seeing itself and it was seeing God only indirectly, now the mind sees Him directly, or in union with Him the mind sees itself too. The mind, by looking at God and by forgetting about itself, in the same time it realizes the happiness that fills the mind up, a happiness coming from God, and this happiness is the light which the mind feels it in itself, though the mind isn't directly preoccupied with itself. By getting out of itself, the mind has gone or it has allowed to be taken into God, but by looking at God and by seeing Him as light the mind sees itself as filled up with light. This is what Saint Gregory Palamas wanted to say through the words: "the mind sees on itself as on something else". (Stăniloae 1992: 285)

"It is right what Lossky says that seeing the godlike light it means a growing up of the self-awareness, or, better said, it is the supreme level of self-awareness, as the unconsciousness or the "soul's sleep" it is a sign of the sin. "If the life in sin, he says, it is sometimes voluntarily unconscious (one closes his eyes in order to not see God), the life in grace is a ceaseless progress of the conscience an increasing experience of the godlike light" (quoted work, p. 216). Without being only that much, the godlike light is that too. And this self-awareness is in the same time a conscience of the own smallness, or vice versa: the humbleness means self-awareness, while the pride it is the absence of the self-awareness." (Stăniloae 1992: 286)

"The mind's self-looking at itself, not as one that has own content but as one empties of all things, through which transparent walls it has penetrated the godlike light and that its have been lightened, it confirms the truth that what the mind sees is, in the first place, that light. Even by seeing on himself, the mind still is in tension towards what the mind isn't, namely towards the godlike light, which fills the mind up and lightens it. By seeing itself only as a reflector of the godlike light, which doesn't put in front of the sight anything of its own content, and by having even the conscience that the power which it sees with, and even the sight function, they belong to God, the mind not being except the subject imparted with sight, the mind is, in the same time with seeing itself, in an act of self-surpassing. In these conditions, the mind's own sight doesn't lock the mind up on a plan of subjectivity, but it keeps it beyond itself, though this beyond has even penetrated within mind, but without identifying with the mind, or the mind has wholly penetrated this beyond. Thus, by looking at God the mind sees on itself, or by looking at itself the mind sees God, without being confounded, like I by looking at you on the love's ecstasy moment I am seeing myself in you too, for I has surpassed myself by penetrating within you, or by looking within myself I am seeing you, for you fill me up and you imprint me entirely." (Stăniloae 1992: 286-287)

“The light one sees while he is in ecstasy, at the end of the clean prayer, it isn’t a physical, light, but it is a spiritual light, seen inside. Saint Gregory Palamas highlights this fact widely.

He reckons that this light it is that light that irradiates eternally out of the presence of Jesus Christ, and this light dresses up the souls of the righteous after their death.” (Stăniloae 1992: 287)

“How could not be that light above senses and above mind once it is shown only after ceasing any natural activity of the human spirit?” (Stăniloae 1992: 288)

“This light, though isn’t a sensitive light, though it is a spiritual light, it spreads from within soul towards outside, over the face and over the body of the one who has it within. Who doesn’t know that a joy from within soul it fills up the face and the eyes with a light which differs from the physical light produces by the sun irradiations? “So shined the face of Moses by the inwards light of his mind that was overflowing over his body too” (Word III, Triad I). So, the light from on the face of Moses shined so brightly, so that the ones who were looking at him weren’t even able to look at that overwhelming light. So looked the sensitive face of Stephen, as an angel’s face” (Ibid). There is a difference between the spreading of that light on the faces of the ones who see it into their ghost, and the light itself as seen by them. If the spreading of that light on their face happened to be seen also by the ones who weren’t elevated to a state above the natural activity of their mind, namely through the natural power of their eyes, that light itself, shown in the ghost of the ones elevated above themselves, even if it was seen with the bodily eyes too, wasn’t seen through the natural power of the eyes but through the power of the Holy Ghost Who was working both through their mind and eyes. So, if the reflection of the godlike light spread over the face of some saints in ecstasy can be seen by anyone, the godlike light itself cannot be seen by anyone. For instance, the light on the night of the Savior’s Birth wasn’t seen by the eyes of the animals, and the light on Mount Tabor – though was shining stronger than sun –, so that anybody could have seen it wherever somebody was, only the three Apostles could see it for within them was working the power of the Holy Ghost. So, even if that light can be seen by the sensitive eyes too, because of not being that light seen with the natural power of the eyes, it is not a sensitive light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 289)

“Being of spiritual order, being a light filling up the mind, this light is a self-unveiling of the mysterious reality of God. That’s why this light is often given names borrowed from the knowledge’s paradigm. But, in the same time, by exceeding everything that the mind can know through its natural work, this light surpasses the knowledge by being above man. This is a knowledge above anything we can experience within the limits of our natural power of knowing. This is a knowledge we couldn't ever reach by the power of our spirit, no matter how much they would be developed, no matter how much they would evolve, because of no evolution can allow to mind to unite itself with God Who is transcendent to creation and to mind's powers. By calling this result of the mind's union with God as knowledge, Palamas calls also the sight of the godlike light as "nescience", but not because there would lack the minimum of science but because it exceeds the maximum of knowledge; not because it is an absence of any intelligibility but because of exceeding the maximum of intelligibility which the mind can reach and comprise." (Stăniloae 1992: 290)

"Seeing the godlike light is superior to the knowledge, and it can be appropriately called even as nescience, and not only because by being received from the Holy Ghost it represents a quantitative and qualitative plus exceeding any possible knowledge of our natural capacities, but also because of not being a knowledge in concepts." (Stăniloae 1992: 292)

"When the seer of the godlike light descends from his state of ecstasy, he strives to catch in concepts and in images what he has seen, but he also realizes that he cannot catch except little pieces from what he has seen. That's why he expresses himself in contradictory concepts (seeing and not-seeing, knowledge and nescience etc.). So, that light is supra-conceptual, but it suggests concepts and images, accompanied by the awareness about their transparency, or of their symbolic character. The indefinite of the loved subject or the infinity of the divine light doesn't occasion us simply the experience of the void, which is caused to us by the indetermination of the nothingness, but is occasions us the experience of a fullness which – as long as we stay under its power – we do not know where to catch it, for we do not have what to catch. That's why Saint Gregory of Nyssa himself, who, as we have seen, accentuated so much the indefinite of the godhead experienced in the divine darkness by Moses, as prototype of any soul that has been cleaned up of passions, he then mentions that in that darkness he received the suggestion of the tent with all its details." (Stăniloae 1992: 296-297)

"Maybe this sight of the divine mysteries as looked in their immateriality and simplicity through the transparence of the spiritual light it comes out of the fact that that light is experienced not as a dull uniformity, or as a luminous chaos, but as an implicit plenitude. A pale analogy offers us the loving relationship between two persons. In this experience the beloved subject, no matter how indefinite would seem, it appears to me as a harmony of infinite spiritual and personal richness." (Stăniloae 1992: 297)

"This makes possible that in God to be contemplated as eternally involved the rationalities of all the existences and it explains the necessity of previously knowing those rationalities in a distinct manner, in order to make the mind capable of increasingly advancing in knowing God as bosom of these rationalities.” (Stăniloae 1992: 297)

“The “structure” isn’t yet a concept, but it is the seed of the concepts. The structure is a form of the living, of the experience, upon which, by being reflected, the concepts are born.

Some analogue structures characterize also the experience of the one who sees the divine light, or who has the feeling of the effective and loving presence of Jesus Christ. The one who sees the divine light he experiences it in the most general mode, as a vast infinite, intimate and holy shelter of the love, that covers him up, that receives him in inside, by comprising everything, in the same time unitarily and simply, in His love. Maybe that’s why Saint Gregory Palamas said that, like Moses, the one who enters the zone of the godlike light he feels himself as covered up by it, as brought out from the scattering that weakens his being, and as hidden from the sight of the ones who remain outside. In this manner is structured the loving relation between him and the godlike light, or this is the form taken by his experience. The more he advances in light, the more he feels that he advances in a holy temple, in a loving intimacy, but that the light will also eternally remain a hidden deep where all the light starts from, and all the love, as an infinite mysterious source, that makes possible an infinite progress of our knowledge, of the love between us and Christ. Thus, the godlike light is lived as a temple with several parts, starting from outside and ending in the “Holy of the Holies”, and in the intimacy of the divine being, that is the hidden eternally locked in the mystery’s darkness, where start in an endless procession from, the waves of light and of love, one after another, as out of an altar, that seems to the believers from the church’s nave as sunk in darkness, but where the glitters of the torches start from, spreading their playful light within nave.” (Stăniloae 1992: 298)

“An analogue sentiment, infinitely more infinite, of retrieval, of resting, of happiness, of coming “home”, must be structuring also the experience of seeing the godlike light, or of entering the heavenly tent, which gather all the things to the supreme Parent. The one who has entered that light he feels his intimate and loving dwelling into Christ. In the same time, he realizes that he isn’t alone with Christ, but everybody is there, and therefore an infinite love for everybody and for everything, it fills his soul up. He must experience the light as an endless wave of love which, starting from Christ and from all the ones being into Him, it attracts him inside it, in the same time overflowing within him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 302)

“Describing all the structures which shape the experience of the ones found worthy of seeing the godlike light it is not given but to them. We notice, by and large, that those structures must be endless and unspeakable nuanced, constantly progressing in their nuancing, and each of them having in the same time an infinite depth and being in a consummate unity with all the things. In this way is explained, on one hand, the fact that the ones coming back from such experiences are able to tell other so many things about God and about His will, or that such supra-conceptual experiences are inexhaustible sources for theirs and others spiritual enrichment; on the other hand, that in the future life we will be contemplating eternally in God, accompanied by endlessly new experiences, the rationalities of all the things, in a consummate unity. For these structures follow a certain progress, being taken in account the measure which the man becomes able on, for increasingly high-quality structures, this fact it also explains their necessity in order to sharpen the mind and to purify the heart during the life, through and for knowing increasingly satisfyingly the rationalities of the things. Thus, the man's moral and intellectual endeavor during his life on earth and by and large the creation with its rationalities and with the relations imposed by creation, it seems to us as not having only a passing role but as having an eternal value. So, we will be with the rationalities of the things, we will benefit forever, being consummate by the moral and intellectual endeavors from on earth." (Stăniloae 1992: 302)

"No matter how useful would be the idea of such structures, we wouldn't have dared to impropriate it in order to clarify with its help some aspects of the experience of seeing the godlike light, if we wouldn't have discovered in it the modern formulation of one of the ideas of Saint Gregory Palamas, developed in connection with a few texts from Dionysus the Areopagite. At this one we find, instead of the term "structure", that one of "imprinted image", or "to imprint and image". It is about an immaterial, incorporeal imprinting, of the mind as the most spiritual man's part, but also of our entire being, being different from the imagination's imprinting. But what can be this shaping which even the angels are submitted to, if not our continuously new structuring, of spiritual nature, which we have tried to clarify before? Unlike Barlaam who didn't admit except the imprinting of sensitive images, Saint Gregory Palamas specifies: "But the godlike imprinting differs much from our human imagination. Namely, this is imprinted in our truly intellectual and bodiless part. But the human imagination unfolds in a part of the soul that is close to the body. The matter which the imprinting is being done there on, it is the highest part of the soul, while here is almost the last part of the soul's powers. The imprinting is being done here by the senses' movements; there, if you want Who is the One making the imprinting in the prophets' understanding, listen to the Great Basil who says: "The prophets understood for the Holy Ghost was the One imprinting their understanding". Thus, the Holy Ghost is the One Who stays upon the mind of the prophets' mind and, by using the understanding as a substance, He foretells through Himself the future things and, through prophets to us too. How could be this imprinting, simply, of the same kind and of the same honor with our imagination?" And Palamas concludes: "So, it is about sights which aren't either sensitive or imagined, but they are something totally different than the knowledge by cogitation" (Word III, poster. Triad). (Stăniloae 1992: 302-303)

"The apparent contradiction between the insistence which the Holy Father demand the mind to reject any images any concept which shape the mind, if the mind wants to know God, and the affirmation that God gives the mind some imprinting, it cannot be solved except in the following manner: the images and the concepts shaped according to the created things give the mind a limited shape, which doesn't allow the mind to become habituated to this at the borderless God. That's why the mind must leave all the images and concepts as finite shapes and to accustom itself to think at the indefinite reality, doing this exercise firstly by focusing upon itself as subject of the cogitation. In this way the mind removes its limits. But the new experience the mind has regarding the realities which limits have been removed (the mind itself, the people's subjects, and especially God) it has its organization, and at its turn is lived in the form of some structures. It is the expression of the love from God and of the love for God, the experience of the greatness of God and of the own humbleness, the experience of the joy and of the happiness. These structured no longer squash it in the finite form of the images and concepts, for each of these structures is limitless and infinite. God is experienced as personal and loving dwelling place without the feeling of His infinity being excluded; the resting, which is another structure experienced by us into God, it is lived at its turn as happy resting in the infinity of God's love. Amongst others, the structured experienced in the loving relationship between two beings, they fill them up with happiness but by the fact that, by not feeling the limits of the feelings which they live, these ones do not make them worry at all because of coming to an end. In this way it is reconciled the contradiction that, on one hand, the mind must leave the finite shapes in order to live God, and on the other hand God imprints the mind with His infinite shapes. These shapes have an existential character in the sense that they shape the entire being of the man, in the sense that the man experienced these shapes as forms of existential and inexhaustible relation between him and God." (Stăniloae 1992: 305)

"The forms of the relations between man and God, though offering at the beginning the experience of the infinite, they do not remain unchanged, but they are always progressing on the measure which the union between the human subject and God it becomes increasingly tighter, increasingly intimate, as God becomes more inwardly and as the human subject has become more capable of receiving God. This is the ceaseless shaping of the man by the Holy Ghost Who makes the man increasingly in God's likeness. But the ontological distance between creature and Creator being infinite, this road of getting closer to God in likeness it will never come to an end, neither will end this work of shaping the man according to the godlike archetype; so, the man won't ever reach to know God as God know on Himself. This road is full of eternity's pilgrims, lined up according to their ontological closeness to God, and according to their voluntary endeavor." (Stăniloae 1992: 305-306)

"Closer to God are the Cherubs and the Seraphim, more far away are the people. But neither the Cherubs will ever end the road of the consummation. The angelic levels are always before us, but neither they will ever exhaust the road. The work of shaping them according to the godlike archetype won't ever come to an end, though they are constantly becoming more closer to the divine model. For the growing up in likeness through this ceaseless shaping it means diminishing the lack of likeness, for the increasing in seeing the godlike light it presupposes some sort of darkness mixed with the light on the inferior levels, and angelic progress is called at its turn as purification, or as "purification of nescience". The eternal live opens to the man - who has been striving during his life on earth to purify himself of passions - not as a lack of movement but as a perspective of endless spiritual progress. But the progress by shaping the spirit, or by experiencing the infinite good things in the form of some lived structures, it starts for the man even before he enters the zone of the seeing of the godlike light. It accompanies in the form of the contemplation or of the intuition and of the spiritual experiencing, almost continuously, the rational and conceptual man's knowledge itself. In the same time with the precisely defined forms and senses, the spiritual man notices also the mysterious background of the transcendence reality. But he doesn't notice that chaotically, but structured in diverse modes and levels of the love." (Stăniloae 1992: 306)

"If to see the godlike light reaches the ones who has cleaned himself of passions and he has reached there by ascending the levels of the virtues to a fiery love for God, this will mean that he has spiritualized his being in such a way than itself his being has become warmth and light of the love for God and for his fellow humans, no longer having him any lack of sensitivity, or having any shadow of worry about himself. This state is the combined result of the man's effort and of the action of the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1992: 306)

"All these three things: a) that the light is the manifestation of the love, b) that the love is the work of the Holy Ghost, and c) that the one who is elevated to this state of light and of culminant love he forgets about his body's sensations, about the sensations produced by the world through his body, or he forgets even about himself, they were described thoroughly by Saint Simeon the New Theologian, in his Hymns of the Godlike Love and, in some measure, by Saint Gregory Palamas." (Stăniloae 1992: 306)

“The love’s warmth that becomes light it has in the same time its source in the work of the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost, by cleaning the soul up of anything that attracts the soul towards thickened pleasures, and in the same time by filling the soul up with delicate and fiery feelings of the love, better said by being Himself the source of these feelings and light sparks, He shown Himself as light. The light is some kind of state of the spiritualized improved, and transparent human being. The soul is filled un with cleanness, with kindness, with love, and the soul feels a great urge to open himself, to communicate his loving feelings, to communicate on himself. And the One Who communicated on Himself through the soul, in this total sincerity of the love, He is the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1992: 307)

“This love’s intensity, the blinding degree of the light poured in this love, it makes the body of whose experiences this light to be totally transparent to others, and to himself as inexistent.

On the measure his spiritual sensitiveness has become more accentuated, his bodily sensations - caused in him by the contact with the world - have been overwhelmed. This is the supreme spiritualization. The body and the world aren’t abolished, but they become the environment which the interior light manifests in. There takes place a paradoxical thing: on one hand all the exterior things are overwhelmed, and on the other hand, a great love it overflows from within them, towards everybody. These things are explained by the fact that out of all of them it irradiates light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 307-308)

“The one who sees the light he has been so much united with it than he no longer knows himself as separated and differing from that light. And if the light is above any possibility of understanding it and of interpret it, he becomes to himself too as above any understanding. Everything has become a light that fills up all the things, and it has become a clean joy, an untold happiness. The differences persist ontologically but they are no longer being felt. Or, the one who sees the light and who feels the joy, he knows about himself only that he sees that light and that he feels that light and that that light isn’t something coming from himself.” (Stăniloae 1992: 308)

“In prayer, you forget about the pressure of all worries caused to you by universe, and you no longer see except God overwhelming all those worries, and as defending you and all the ones whom you pray for, against all evilness, and as giving to all of you, all you have asked for. You are above all things with God, or you no longer see even on yourself, as reckoning that you are something or that you do something through yourself, but you only see God, as overflowing Himself upon you and upon others His all-merciful power. You are focused in a state of maximum perceiving and experiencing, on God and on the overflowing of His loving light and mercy, upon you and within you and upon the ones whom you pray for. In prayer, God is highlighted to the highest and more overwhelming extent, without annulling you, but He is embracing you with His love and mercy.” (Stăniloae 1995: 161)

“The believer is still from this life, sometimes, partaker to seeing the godlike light. The apparitions which Jesus let Himself to be seen by His disciples in, in His glory raised from death, they were doubtlessly moments of the end of the history in its middle, an eschatological sight exceeding “the sight and the knowledge brought by faith”. But to this sight our being doesn’t raise through its natural powers, but through the godlike powers, which, of course, do not remove the natural powers, but only intensify them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 246)

Senses

“Palamas asks what could reckon God as sensitive like, the ones who suspend the activity of their external senses?” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 53)

Sex

“An act of God places in the previous ones something that is developed in new order of existence. But in a certain sense, all the posterior ones have been foreseen in what has been created in the beginning, and then especially in the immediately anterior ones, or what has been created by God in the beginning it has been created by God capable of receiving also the power through which to appear new orders. Thus, everything comes out of the will of God, but His will also uses the previous ones. Or, everything has been created by Him, but in a certain conformity and connection amongst them. That’s one we can say that, on one hand, they have been created ‘in the beginning’, but on the other hand, we can say that the creation comes to an end with the creation of the man. This is for the creation isn’t whole until God doesn’t unveil its purpose into man. The man appears only at the end, for he needs all the previously created things. And the previous things do not find their meaning except into man. The successive apparition of the other people out of the first man it is no longer a creation as the one in the beginning, because it remains on the same plan. But on the other hand, each human soul is a novelty, for each soul is being created; and this happen in a real dialogue of God with His parents.” (Stăniloae: 2003: 347-348)

“Before sin, the love between man and woman wasn’t burdened with the violent passion that has something from the elements of the not-personalized and not-spiritualized nature. All the human structures have been lowered through sin.” (2003: 420)

“In the difference between man and woman, the humanity has as positive fact a more important completion, and therefore it has the occasion of a more accentuated spiritual enrichment. It is what exceeds the violence of the sexual pleasure, in which the material sensitiveness has achieved such an overwhelming force, and it lasts beyond that pleasure. The love that can be developed on the basis of the spiritual completion between man and woman, it exceeds the dimensions of the sexual pleasure, and one can say that the spiritual completion can be deepened even more, and it is more durable when there is not preoccupation for this pleasure. But the people must multiply for the interminable richness occasioned to everyone, and to the humanity by and large, the multitude of various relations between an indefinite number of unique persons in their originality.” (2003: 421)

“Each of the two husbands accomplished the state which he aspires to, and they accomplish themselves like persons in reciprocal communion. But they accomplish themselves only when the bodily love is penetrated by the spiritual love and it is overwhelmed by it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 127)

“When the woman reached to her husband such an intimate and clean humanity, through the overwhelming of the bodily love by the spiritual love, he can look with clean eyes at any woman, and the man can look with clean eyes at any man. The marriage is thus a road towards the two husbands' spiritualization, not only in the relation they have with each other, but in all the relations they have with all the people. All women receive a spiritual depth for the man reached here, in the person of his woman, and all men, for woman, in the person of her man. But the man remains united with his woman, for his familiarity with her uniqueness, for accomplishing himself like person and for recognizing Christ through the environment of this uniqueness. And the same does the woman. Here is shown again the family's social importance." (Stăniloae 1997: 127-128)

"But here must be specified that even by knowing this importance of the marriage, the Christian still remains realistic. He doesn't despise the need for bodily union between man and woman. The prayers from wedding do not at all avoid speaking about it. But the Christian reckons that only in marriage it becomes a means of complete souls' union, or it deepens this union increasingly more. So, by approving the marriage in order to satisfy the need for bodily union between man and woman, it considers this union in the same time as promoting the soul's union." (Stăniloae 1997: 128)

"The Christian doesn't know but two right attitudes regarding the bodily lust: or total restraint from it outside marriage, or using its satisfying as means of soul's union and of advancing in it. This is the immaculacy of the bed which the prayers from the wedding speak about, or the conjugal chastity. Like the monastic chastity, the conjugal chastity, at its turn, it is a freedom of the spirit. And for both of them there is required a spiritual struggle. When satisfied outside the marriage, the bodily lust enslaves the man in such extent, so that he no longer sees in woman except an instrument of satisfying his lust, and vice versa in case of the woman. But this can occur in marriage too, but only where the two do not make the effort to transfigure and to spiritualize, through the union of their souls, their bodily union. In such a case, the bodily lust, quickly bored by a woman of by a man, it looks for satisfaction elsewhere." (Stăniloae 1997: 128)

"Out of realistically understanding the helplessness of the most people to totally abstain from the bodily lust, and out of understanding the marriage like unique means of transfiguring the bodily lust, of transforming the bodily lust through the penetration of the bodily union by the soul's union between man and woman, it comes the great honor the Church grants to the Wedding's Mystery." (Stăniloae 1997: 128)

"Others, overlooking the marriage's justification as remedy against concupiscence, they consider that the marriage justifies its existence only by giving birth to children. But in this it is even more obviously included the marriage's understanding more like a bodily union. Amongst the important representatives of this understanding must be mentioned Saint Augustine. Paul Evdokimov, combating this interpretation, he considered the bond of the marriage as sublime in itself, not needing to give birth to children in order to justify itself. He rightly disapproves the doubts concerning the moral quality of the bodily bond.” (Stăniloae 1997: 129)

“Saint Apostle Paul considered didn’t accept the satisfying of the bodily lust outside the marriage. So, he considers it as sin when it is satisfied outside the marriage. But why is this considered a sin when satisfied outside the marriage? Of course, not only for the social disorder it causes, but also because of not being transfigured through a soul’s union, produced by the spiritual union in marriage. In fact. Who doesn’t know that the one who looks at the woman from outside his marriage he sees her narrowed to the quality of an object of carnal pleasure? Only in marriage the woman is unveiled as person with the whole complexity of problems, which she needs to be helped in, which she need not to be alone in, as the man need too; only the marriage elevated the bond between man and woman up to friendship and to deep practical responsibility, which each of them must totally engage in.” (Stăniloae 1997: 129)

“The marriage isn’t a simple remedy tolerated for satisfying a lust that still remains sinful, but a means to make that the bond between man and woman to truly be a complete bond, a bond of a total communion between persons, in which bond each of them accomplishes himself as person, or as a true human being, by helping the other one too, on this purpose, in order this bond to be as God wanted when He created the human being like man and woman, towards a reciprocal completion. In this sense, the Church conceives the husbands’ bond like a complete, bodily and of the souls’ bond. In the true marriage, the two husbands they progress in the union of their souls, for, actually, one can progress only in this. They too must help this progress with their will. In this sense they are given the grace of this Mystery. They must have the conscience that, if their bond is reduced to the satisfying of the bodily lust, this one slips towards sin, and it is in danger of disintegration.” (Stăniloae 1997: 129)

“Without contesting the importance of the bodily bond, the Christendom doesn’t either justify it in its exclusiveness. When Saint Paul declares the marriage as a remedy against the difficult to be endured burning, or against disorderly satisfying this burning, he includes in this purpose of the marriage that one of the means of transfiguration of the bodily union.” (Stăniloae 1997: 129)

“Actually, an important means which helps the two husbands to advance towards a soul’s union, it is the giving birth and the rising up of children. The acts of bodily union are combined by assuming this responsibility for a more accentuated spiritual element. Thus, in the first phase of the marriage a great role in the transfiguration of the bodily bond, which holds a greater place in the union of the two husbands, it belongs to the assuming of the responsibility for giving birth to children, for in the second part, this bond to be mostly overcome in its being by the spiritual union which the two husbands have progressed into. It is true that the text of Saint John Chrysostom declares a marriage accomplished also when it fulfills only its main purpose: the regulation of the sexuality, even without fulfilling its second purpose: giving birth to children. But he added that the marriage is accomplished without giving birth to children, when the children are absent not for the husbands wanted so, but against their will. This is because when the giving birth to children is intentionally avoided, the bond between the two husbands falls into a simple occasion of satisfying the bodily lust, and thus it passes to sinful acts.” (Stăniloae 1997: 130)

“The born and raised up children do not stay outside the bond between the two husbands, but they essentially increase the communion between marriage, through their common responsibility which they are united in, and therefore the children deepen the marriage’s essence, which without children it is deprived of its spiritual internal substance. The two husbands, in such a case, they often become an egotistic unity in two, maybe of an egotism even more accentuated than in the case of one, and this is because a husband has in the other one, everything he needs in order to satisfy himself in the material-bodily order and in order not to suffer either of loneliness, as much as suffers the one who is locked up in his egotism by himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 130)

“Everybody’s unity in the universal body and their distinction from each other, are upheld through the death and through the mysterious resurrection, or as perfect love, totally free one, or a spiritual and clean one, like that one of the angels, not by the law of the nature or of the sex, which is only a small part of that one and a means of finding that one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 278)

“The man and the woman have in their united seed, concentrated, not only their specific bodies, but in that seed, there are present, as in a whole, the body and the soul of each one of them, and their souls being united through the union between their bodies, their souls give birth not only to a new body, but to a new soul too, of course not without God’s work. This is for the man and the woman exceed, through conscience, their simple bodily union. In this sense, the descendants of the parents are called as the parents’ seed (Gen. 21: 13; 28: 14 etc.). That’s why, in the fact that the human being puts in his bodily acts – even in the act of making love between man and woman – the conscience of his responsibility, the body shows its great importance and honor which it has been granted with, through the working presence within body of the conscious and free spirit, in the acts committed by the body.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 45)

“When the bodily willing acts, are committed by the human being without this conscience of his characteristic own responsibility, they are reckoned as shameful acts, as are reckoned too, the people committing them. Even in this, the human being shows that the acts committed through the body, are in the same time acts of the spirit too, and he cannot commit them as animal acts, since the human bring in the system of laws of his being the element of his freedom in the support of his conscience. The animal’s acts aren’t reckoned as shameful acts, because of not being acts of conscience and freedom. So, the spirit makes the body, and through body the spirit makes the world too, as participating to the spirit’s subjectivity and mystery. This is because they through themselves, they wouldn’t have these qualities. But I know the world as a mystery unconscious about itself, as the body doesn’t know about itself too. But the human being, as spirit, he knows about himself and about both body and spirit, only through both body and spirit, and this fact shows the participation of the body and of the world to the subjectivity of the spirit, and the impossibility to know them in their full objectivity. But, by this, the world’s mystery appears to me, on the other hand, as mystery of the body too, and, more than that, as insufficient in itself, though not depending on me, and, by that, being superior to my power. The world, thus, it ties me to my fellow humans and to God. The world becomes transparent to me, for the life of my fellow humans and to God. From egotistic prey that nourishes and that develops the egotism, the enmity, and the separation amongst people, the world becomes a loving bridge amongst everybody, and amongst everybody and God. Through the world one can see and it is communicated their light. The things given as gifts are filled up with the rays of the communicative love. The things given as gifts are set free from the seal placed on them by greediness, by pride, or by the egotistic voluptuousness. The human being is sanctified through the things given as gifts, and those things are sanctified as well, especially when they are given as gifts to the poor people who really need them, for through those things is extended the clean and merciful love of God and of the people.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 45-46)

“The fact that the embryo has in him, right from the beginning, the soul too, it can be seen also in the fact that the conceiving of the child it is also the ground which both the parents transcend from, to the conscious, serious care for the child, a care especially strengthened starting with the moment the parents knew the child was conceived. Thus, the parents live their reciprocal responsibility for the child, as for a whole human being.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 84)

“The soul is considered both as born out of his parents and created by God. The soul would be the result of a collaboration of God with the soul’s parents. Actually, even when we say that the body is born out of parents, for the body is accompanied by the sensorial and vital powers and organized as an organ of the conscious functions of the soul that comes from God, one can reckon that this collaboration between parents and God is extended not only upon the body but also upon the soul. This is because a body, without the soul’s vital, sensorial, and rational functions coming from God, it isn’t a living body. So, even to the body’s conceiving there works the created soul, as also for the apparition of the soul with his vital, sensorial, and rational functions, it is necessary the conceiving of the body through the mating of the parents. The whole human being is brought in the world, both by his parents and by God, but the fundamental working power it belongs to God.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 84)

“The parents’ bodies, by mating, they convey, on the other hand, their united rationality, upheld by the vital, sensorial, and rational functions of their souls, or even by the whole souls, to the body in conceiving. But in the forming of a new body, there are overwhelmingly active the vital, sensorial, and spiritual functions of the new soul created by God and that soul himself in his entirety.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 84)

“The work of God in the conceiving of a child, it can be seen in the seal imprinted right at the conceiving of each human being brought to this life. And the uniqueness distinguishing each new human being from his parents, or from their bodily synthesis and their souls’ synthesis, as also from any other human being, it is one with the unique relation each man is with God in. Through that relation each human being is created as distinct partner of the dialogue with God.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 85)

Sin

“Only by being above the nature’s automatism, the man could truly love God, or the man could really be virtuous. A virtue, or not committing a sin by nature and not by will, it doesn’t represent a spiritual force.” (Stăniloae 2003: 431)

“When the nature has fallen in everybody to the state of full depersonalization, it has been broken in pieces which do not fully communicate to one another, in individuals who exclude one another and who do not get spiritually enriched, but they remain and they are sinking themselves in an increasingly deeper egotistic spiritual poverty, each one trying to annex the another, in order to get what that one has, without that one’s permission. This is because of this tendency causing the same tendency in the others, and therefore there takes place a general fight amongst them, and a general weakening of the nature. This state is characteristic also to the demons in the highest degree. They coexist because of they need to torment one another and to fight against the good people, in a coexistence of the fight that it has become a necessity to them, attesting by this that nobody can live totally separated from the ones of the same nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 475-476)

“The falling of the proto-parents from God, it formally consisted in an act of disobedience. By this act itself, they broke themselves internally, from God, from the positive dialogue with God. They no longer answered God, believing that through this they affirm their freedom, their autonomy. Actually, this act was the beginning of the egotistic closing up of the man in himself. By this the man has become his own slave. The man will be free only if he is free of himself too, for others, in love, if he is free for God Who is the source of the freedom, for He is the source of the love. But the disobedience uses as occasion the commandment of not to taste out of the tree of knowing the good and the bad.” (Stăniloae 2003: 489)

“Out of the reciprocal involving of the state of disobedience as a getting far from God, and of the passionate impulse, born out of the mixing between sensuality and the sensitive aspect of the world, it results a more complex meaning of this sad knowledge of the good and of the bad, or of the man’s falling. It turns out the disobedience, the pride, the egotistic lust of ours, as weakening of the spirit. And they cause a narrowing of the knowing of the creation of God, the man looking at what he can dominate and at what can satisfy his bodily needs and pleasures, which has become passions. The bodily passion at their turn, they will sustain the pride of the man who satisfies them. The man will be proud of his exclusively material needs and passions; these ones will be justified by his proud claiming that he is an autonomous being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 493-494)

“The Christian teaching believes that through sin the creation has become, from transparent curtain of the love between us and God, a wall in some measure opaque, between us and God: therefore, it is no longer a motif for union between us, but it is now a motif for separation and strife between us. The earth had been defiled through the Adam’s sin, and through the sins of Adam’s descendants, sometimes to the staining with the blood of the murders, of the wars caused by people’s egotism, greediness, and envy. The people crooked and covered to one another their image, through lack of love and despise.” (Stăniloae 2003: 506)

“In many cases, the uncontrolled body, in its greediness for the things of the senses, it has covered the soul, and the soul dominated by the inferior egotistic passions it has lost the sensitiveness of the conscience and therefore the transparence to God and to the fellow humans. Often the individual dominated by shameful impulses, he has tried to hide his interior from people and from God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 506)

“The human being cannot lose the quality of responsible being, even if often refuses to give the true answer. The Adam’s will of hiding himself from the face of God, for getting out from the communion with God, it cannot be completely done, but it has caused in a certain measure the creation and our being to become non-transparent to God and to the fullness of the richness and of the love possible amongst people. Through this, the human being often reached a tormenting loneliness, like the one of Cain. The sin has introduced amongst people: egotism, lust for unessential things, spiritual weakening, death of the soul followed by the body’s death and the eternal death. The sin has brought and caused it to increase, the getting blurred of the most essential and the most beautiful dimensions of the existence: the dimension of the infinite spirit and of the endless consummation in the spirit, the dimension of untold beauty of the fellow humans as sources of always clean and refreshed love, the dimension of the integral good easy to be accomplished. The integral meaning of the existence has become, thus, difficult to be understood, causing countless divergent opinions, and causing fight amongst people. The sure horizon of the value and of the imperishable existence of the human person, it has been blurred.” (Stăniloae 2003: 506-507)

“Before Christ, the sin impeded us to reach and to persist in the full communion with God and with the fellow humans. The sin placed obstacles in the way of the integral accomplishing of the noble aspirations inscribed within our nature. But the ‘image of God’ within man, it has been only blurred and weakened, but not totally erased. Just from here it comes the torment of our being: from the fact that it cannot be appeased to inferior satisfactions, to evilness, and to the perspective of the eternal death, And this is because our being continues to preserve a discontent conscience and a sufferance for not accomplishing the thirst for the communion with God, a sufferance for falling off the communion with God, for falling off the quality of image of God. Our being cannot be appeased with the minus it has, and that's why our being searches for the plus, but in a way that at its turn it increases the minus. Our being tries to escape death by all sorts of accomplishments - in immanence - which lack the eternal durability. Especially these ones cannot escape the man from death." (Stăniloae 2003: 507-508)

"Neither the corruptibility nor the death is punishment from God, but they are consequences of our estrangement from the source of the life. They aren't meant to last eternally, but God transforms their meaning in means of healing the evil. Without this change, the punishment for sin it would be eternal." (Stăniloae 2003: 509)

"The weakening of the man's capacity of knowing God as Person through a transparent world, of living in communion with God and with his fellow humans, it meant not only a withdrawal of the grace of God, but also a weakening of the image of God within man. But in this way the man hasn't been totally destroyed. The man has the aspiration towards an infinite knowledge, within which it is hidden the thirst for God, knowledge that sometimes it intuits this thirst; the need for good it has never been totally erased from within man, though we do not always conceive the good as communion. The communion with the fellow human it has remained at its turn in a weakened state." (Stăniloae 2003: 510)

"The sin is a closing up, of the man, towards God (God as infinite source of power), a will of disregarding Him, of forgetting about him; the sin is an enmity towards God. But the sin is a closing up towards the fellow human too. And if the person is a factor in relationship, in openness - and in the case of the man, of this it consists his humanity too -, the sin will mean a weakening of the character as person, or of the hypostatical character of the man, a weakening of his loving humanity." (Stăniloae 2006: 38)

"In Jesus Christ the sin cannot exist, for in Him there isn't a human hypostasis which to be able to close himself to God as Person. The human nature of Christ, it has its real subsistence, namely its concrete actualization, in the Hypostasis of the Word. That's why, the godlike Word, by hypostatizing in Himself our human nature, "by cleaning our human nature just by the fact that He has assumed it, he has deified the whole human nature by His embodiment". He puts our human nature, just by this fact, in the fullness of the liberty from the sinful passions, and in the actuality of its powers." (Stăniloae 2006: 38)

“We must understand that the affects or the sufferings, including the corruptibility as pin of the affects and as their result, they have not only the character of consequences of the sin, but they are also instruments against the sin. They are also punishments for the sin, but not as being brought by God: they are rather consequences of the man’s getting out from the connection with God Who is the source of the life. But, once they have occurred, God gives them also the character of antidote for sins.” (Stăniloae 2006: 41)

“These affects, or sufferings, together with the corruptibility and with the death consequent to the sin, they are the curse Christ has identified Himself to, and which He took upon Himself, in order to redeem us from under the curse of the law (Gal. 2: 13).

Through these ones, he knew in His own body the consequences of the sin, but in the same time, by undoing the interweaving between affects and sin, he has emptied both their power and the power of the sin, because of these ones are reciprocally fueling each other. But he has abolished the power of the sin also within His fellow humans, and by doing this He has also diminished the power of the affects within them. He has done this not from outside, but by making this power to irradiate from within Himself, for he has abolished within Himself the interweaving between affects and sin. This is for, by giving, on Himself, towards being imparted to others, as One Who has overcome the natural affects, as fruits and source of the sin, He has given His fellow human too, the power to do this, by undoing in their earthly life the unconditional bond between sufferings and sins, and by enduring the suffering without committing sin, in order to abolish the power of both of them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 42-43)

“By the fact that, by being imparted with His most-clean body, which held under control the consequent to the sin affects, without letting the affects to slide into sin, we can overcome not only the affects but the sin too, one can say that Jesus has endured these suffering and death for our sin, in order to deliver us from it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43)

“The connection between these sufferings and our sin it is tighter, and that’s why Christ’s death for our sin it has a deeper meaning. The pains he endured weren’t only pains consequent to our sin, but also pains for our sin. On the basis of the full solidarity with us, by the fact that He is the godlike Hypostasis of the human nature, and therefore He is totally different from any hypostasis capable of closing himself towards others, Christ has made, on Himself, the human center that is no longer submitted to any tendency of gathering, on Himself, in Himself, through His free will, but he is totally open to others, by giving them too, this power which He endured the sufferings with, without sliding towards egotistically sparing Himself of sufferance. He has accomplished thus, by sufferance too, a union with us, which remains to be accepted by us, but appropriating to ourselves His victory upon the separation sin.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43)

“Christ endured our sin and He has overcome it and it would have been His sin. Thus, He assumed our sin and he suffered because of it, but without committing it Himself; he suffered even more than us, for he has in His perfect love or in His lack of any egotism, a way deeper sensitiveness, for the evilness the sin represented. That’s why He was suffering for everybody’s sin, whilst a simple man, even reaching to suffer for sin he rather suffers for his sin and he suffers even lesser for the sin of his close ones, or for the sin of other people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43)

“One could notice related to the fact that Christ suffered for our sin without committing it, the paradoxical fact that: on one hand He was open to everybody, but they weren’t open to Him, and this made Him suffering, unlike the people who didn’t suffer for the fact that others were closed to them. But in the same time, for neither the human nature He assumed out of the people’s nature it wasn’t able to reach the full transparency and the power to liberate the people from any closure, until the human nature passes through the death of the present form of the body. Until then, the humanity couldn’t have been accomplished either in Him, in the fullness of the transparency to others, namely of the full power of gaining others for the communion with Him and amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43)

“The people’s sin, as their callous closure towards Christ, it was pressing upon Him, or it was live by Him with an extreme sensitiveness. On the other hand, in His openness towards God, He wanted to have all the people, together with Himself, open towards God. But the people weren’t. And this was also due to the fact that their body was submitted to thickening, consequently to the sin, so that it wasn’t fully transparent to God and in the reports the people had amongst them. This fact made Christ again suffering for everybody’s sin, because of the body of because of the body’s impulses towards egotistic pleasures, the people remained difficult to be sensitized for His love. The people’s closure towards God was hard to overcome, and because of this God couldn’t be made transparent to them. Thus, Christ remained with His human nature, on one hand in solitude, and on the other hand in some kind of solidarity in sufferance, with all the sinners, for the universal sin. He had to fight for abolishing the universal sin, like for His own cause, in order to abolish the cause of His sufferance. And this was for He had made out of their sufferance His own sufferance. His sufferance due to the everybody’s sin, given in enduring the affects, the sufferings, and the death, it was, paradoxically, in the same time a sufferance for delivering them from sin for it was a clean sufferance. And only a clean sufferance for sin, unmixed with the sin, it can abolish the sin, whose burden He was enduring it also out of the solidarity He was with them in, and out of the helplessness of fully accomplishing the communion with them by a total transparency of the body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43)

“Christ’s sufferance for people’s sin had therefore to go until the death of His earthly body, in order to reach its resurrection and its full transparence to the people. But this sufferance, which was greater than everybody’s and, it was for their sin too, it made Him, on the other hand, able to willingly go to death, for the full surpassing of the universal sin. And again, on the other hand, this death as passing towards resurrection, it was necessary for making His body fully transparent to God and, by doing this, for making God Himself and His humanity directly transparent to the people and, consequently, for making people’s humanity too, transparent, by spiritually imitating His death, done by the ones who believe in Him. So, it had to have a direction both towards God and towards the people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43)

“In this sense, Saint Cyril of Alexandria insisted in his work called Worshipping in Ghost and Truth, upon the fact that at God one cannot enter except in state of clean sacrifice and no man could do that by himself, because of being sinner. Only Christ, as man without sin, He was able to enter, as clean sacrifice, at the Father, and only in Him we can enter there to. If the sin is egotism, the egotism of the spiritual pride or the bodily pleasure, the opposite of the sin is the consummately clean sacrifice. In the consummately clean sacrifice Christ was able to bring it, through His lack of sin, for the people, one can see that Christ was by His lack of sin and by this sacrifice He brought, consummately the “man for people”. This shows that without lacking the sin, and without suffering for our sin – the sin as cause of our lack of transparency or of our bodily mortality -, and without overcoming these consequences of the sin, Christ couldn’t have saved us. By lacking any sin, Christ was, as human being, fully transparent to God and to people, by the full ministration He brought to God and by practicing a full responsibility before God and for people. But he wasn’t transparent with His body too. And this made Him too, to suffer for the others’ sin, and to surpass this state through death, for God and for people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 43-44)

“In the Western theology, though, apparently, the anger of God is considered here as being directed against the sin and not upon the man, in reality, by the fact that taking the man out of the sin it is regarded like necessarily implying the man’s punishing, the anger is directed against the sinful man too. The distinction between the sinner and the sin it is done only where the forgiveness doesn’t come consequently to the expiation and to the satisfying, but God has the initiative of the communion with the man in order to provoke, within the man too, the answer through communion. When the answer takes place, then it takes place the forgiveness too. This is because the answer has the meaning of a repentance too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 60)

“Of course, the man impropriates the impulse towards communion, initiated by God, by renouncing to the state of sin, as state of egotism. And this renunciation is a hard and therefore painful effort to him. But painful too is the persistence in sin, given all the consequences the sin involves. But, since the man makes out of the painful consequences of the sin means for overcoming the sin, they cease being an enduring of them as punishments. Actually, the sin’s consequences which have a character of punishment, they are: the egotistic impulses, the pains, and the death. Accepting the egotistic impulses, it causes the pains with their final, which is the death. But, satisfying them, it also means committing the sin in continuation. The death and the sin consequent to them in this case they mean not only a consequence of the sin, but they also mean a punishment of the sin. The pain, as strained effort of renouncing to egotistic impulses, though it still has the character of a consequence of the sin, it no longer has the character of a punishment for the sin, but it has the character of means for liberation from the state of sin and, as such, of accomplishing the communion which will bring also the resurrection to the eternal life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 60)

“God accepts the man not because the man endures a punishment for his sin, but because the man makes the effort of no longer committing sin, for he has removed from the pains he endures, the character of punishment for sin, by making them consequences of the sin and means of fighting against the sin and of entering the communion offered by God. Of course, this too is an extolling of God, an extolling that is even more real than that offered by enduring the pain and the death as punishment for the sin or as satisfying the offended honor of course, this too is an extolling of God, an extolling that is even more real than that offered by enduring the pain and the death as punishment for the sin or as satisfying the offended honor of God.

Only Christ was the First One to be able to do this, and only in Him we are able to do this too. In Christ the pain and the death for the first time, they have fully changed their role as punishment for sin, though, on the other hand, He has assumed them as consequences of the sin, or as “curse” that has come upon the whole mankind consequently to the sin. These consequences have, right by themselves, not only the character of curse, but also of means of limiting or overcoming the sin, by disgusting the man, of sin, because of them, and by using them for limiting the sin through them, and by using them as means for getting out of sin. But only in Christ they have been actually cleaned of their character as punishments for sin, for only within Him they have ceased to be mixed with the sin. That’s why only in Him the death has been defeated, for only in Him the death has become a holy sacrifice or means for sanctifying the human nature and only in Him the pains too have become means of fully overcoming of themselves and of the death, for they too have become means for sanctifying the human nature and “medicine” for the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 60)

“The cleaning up of the ancestral sin, namely the liberation of the will from the ancestral sin’s slavery and the dwelling in the will of the freedom of Christ and of its powers capable of keeping a man in continuous movement towards good, it is such a mysterious event, so hidden in the deep of our being, so that is not shown except when passing in deeds of our will. We know, from our side, only the total intention of dying to the sin and of living into Christ. But our death with Christ, it is shown that it has been effective in Baptism, for our intentions of dying met the Christ’s death, by being activated after Baptism.” (Stăniloae 2006: 115)

“We must keep ourselves in a permanent tension in order to overcome our sins as much as possible, by elevating ourselves to as little mistakes as possible, and confessing, in the same time, the mistakes we continue to make. The antinomy is being solved through confession: “If we confess our sins, He is faithful and righteous to forgive our sins and to clean us up of all injustice” (I Jn. 1: 9)” (Stăniloae 2006: 117)

“God take our sins seriously, for he writes them down or He takes notice of them as real. But God takes in consideration our repentance too, for those sins. This is for in repentance we overcome the locking up in ourselves and we enter the loving communion with Him; so, actually the sins disappear, of course due to the fact that we are welcomed by the Christ’s grace or love. But we must not intentionally commit sins, by thinking in advance that Christ is going to forgive us for our repentance. This would mean accustoming ourselves not to take either the repentance seriously. This would mean being pushed towards the sin not only by our real helplessness but it would mean committing the sin because of being disrespectful to God, because of thinking that we can take advantage of His mercy. God take in account our real helplessness, but not our pretended helplessness. Christ’s sacrifice has been brought for our helplessness, and not for our intensions of insincerely taking advantage of His mercy, in the state from after Baptism which most of our helplessness has been healed in, by Christ, with His power, for He is dwelling within us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 117)

“If in the Gospel according to Matthew (12: 31-32) the Lord says that the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost won’t be ever forgiven, or in the Epistle I of John (5: 16) are listed separately the mortal sins and the not-mortal sins, the first ones must be understood as callousness of the ones who do not want to repent for their sins. In the Epistle towards Hebrews (6: 4-10 and 10: 26-29) are told harsh words about the ones who, knowing Christ and having His grace from Baptism, they totally fall off from Christ; it is therefore affirmed the difficulty those ones to renew themselves, since they have accustomed themselves not to take Christ seriously (“They trampled the Son of God”, 10: 29). But the possibility of forgiveness it still is admitted, for in the same Epistle towards Hebrews (6: 12), it is recognized the possibility of a certain delay in fulfilling the will of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 91-92)

“Through sin, the man suddenly fell from the true rationality and from the exercise of loving speech of the full communion with his fellow human, for it has been weakened within man the connection with the Rationality, with the godlike Word, and the sharp responsibility towards That One. The ones who no longer lives fully the responsibility towards God, he neither lives his responsibility towards his fellow human; and vice versa. In his rationality have entered some traits of perversity, his word has often been liar, a means of apparent communion and not of true communion. His rationality has been searching for meanings in egotistic pleasures, and not in communion: it has become egotistic, by expressing itself in insincere words, in deeds contrary to other people, words and deeds which have been no longer searching for, and no longer accomplishing, the real communion, because of the man has been hiding through them his egotistic plans which have no longer been useful to other people but aiming to do them evil.” (Stăniloae 1997: 308)

“The sin, consisting in a passionate selfishness, it has produced disorder and anarchy amongst people, instead of unification in love.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If we look at the things more attentively, we will see that the pride, in the last analysis, even that one that doesn’t grow up consequently to the sensitive goods, it still is occasioned by some skills related to the world and it is possible by the fact that the man takes in account his fellow human, whom he reckons himself as superior to. If the man had been aware of his absolute loneliness - or if he had been aware of staying in front of God -, the pride wouldn’t have been possible in him. Somehow, the pride is also a victory of the world upon man, a victory of the feeling, as superficial perceiving of the world upon mind, the mind that sees God just through the world, and beyond world. One would even say that in the fallen angels too, though missing a body, the pride has been born by the fact that they looked at the man’s created world which they felt themselves superior to. The energy which they were trying to enrich themselves with from God, it has become energy which they tried to enrich themselves though, by mastering upon others who were inferior to them. And the anger which is being developed in an affect that sticks the man too much to the world, it too has its source in the feeling that has got out from the mind’s control.” (Stăniloae 1992: 65-66)

“About the much-speaking, John Climacus said that ‘it is the sign of the vain glory manifesting through it’. It is “the proof of the ignorance, the door of the gossip, it is a pedagogue towards flippancy, it is the lie's servant, it is the destroyer of the humbleness, it is the cause of the lie, and it is the forerunner of the sleep". And the silence has the opposite virtues. "The one who knows his mistakes he keeps his mouth shut - while the much-speaking doesn't know himself yet. The silence's friend get himself closer to God and by secretly speaking to God he receives the light from God" (Level XI). As through the bodily passions the man looks at world, by emptying himself of spirit, likewise the much-speaking is the angle which the vain glory searches for the people's praising through, and therefore it is also an enslavement of the man to the exterior things." (Stăniloae 1992: 124)

"A great disorder within the human beings and amongst them it is the passionate division brought by sin. The people with enmity are darkened: the light of the simulate friendship it is a false light. Only the living of the unity through love it opens the springs of light chocked in its deep. My concepts about you as concepts of the self, putting a distance between me and you, or a separation, they are a sign of the absence of the love." (Stăniloae 1992: 294)

"It often happens that the man doesn't work convergently with the work of the divine paradigm. And in such cases the man's seen image isn't concretized totally conform with the divine paradigm. The man crooks the work of the prototype exercised upon him, like a faulty mirror crooks the rays of the model who looks at it, but without the divine energy to suffer, by this, any alteration. What deviates the man from the work convergent with that of the divine paradigm, it is the sin. And, through Adam, the sin has been extended to all people. And the universal-human sin has degraded the entire seen world. The action of the sinful mankind has disturbed the nature's forces and it keeps those forces in a continuous disturbance. Besides this, the man who is dominated by sin, he doesn't have his sight enough clear in order to be able to look through things at the divine transcendence, because of no longer having the impetus of the transcending. To the sinner the things cease to be symbols, namely they cease to be godlike prototypes. The power to make, through the seen things, the transcending towards God, it is identical to the faith. And this has been fully brought only by the grace of Christ." (Stăniloae 2005: 113)

"Consequent to the sin, as separation from God, the woman received the birth pains, united with the joy of having children, and with the pleasure of the conceiving. And the pains of the women giving birth to children made possible the apparition of the Son of God born out of a Virgin. In receiving the birth pains by the successive women, pains united with the joy of having children, those women had the vague feeling that, in the end, those pains were to lead to the birth of the Son of God as man, namely as Savior." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 155)

“Through the painful consequences of the sin, the Word of God prepared the people for waiting for Him and for receiving Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 156)

“Each human being must get out of the ancestral sin of the human nature, by his own decision, even if his parents are Christians.” (Stăniloae 1995: 174)

“In what regard the ancestral sin, H. Andrutsos, in his work The Dogmatics, by presenting the difficulties related to the theology of the conceiving of the new human beings, he couldn’t decide either for admitting the transplantation of the soul from the parents – eventually starting with Adam and Eva -, whom all the souls would have been given within, and the creationism.

In what concerns the ancestral sin, he reckons that both the mentioned theories make difficult, either taken separately, or together, the inheritance of this sin from Christian parents, who have been cleaned of that sin, at their Baptism. He doesn’t admit the explanation of the place from Rom. 5: 12 through the expression “in whom all of us have sinned”. Some explanation could be the following: the sin of the first people has extended into the human nature, upon the descendants. Out of that sin, each man must exist personally, by attaching himself to Christ. The Christian parents personally exited that sin through their Baptism. But because they bear a nature that isn’t locked up in itself, namely detached from the general humanity, though they existed that sin in their personal existence, still in the general nature of the ones whom the Christian parents are in connection with, that sin has remained, and any human being come to existence, he must exit that sin, by his own decision. One could say that, in what is united out of parents, this sin enters as through a door, coming from the general human nature, because what is united out of those parents it doesn’t represent them so much, but it rather represents the general human nature, namely the nature of the future people too. When the persons comprised as virtuality in this general human nature, they are brought to existence as actual persons, they must decide for themselves, to exit the sin of the general nature. They must enter a personal relation with God, offered by Him by breathing the Ghost upon them, at their Baptism, as their parents too, they entered this relation at their one Baptism, by receiving anew the breath of the Holy Ghost, like Adam did on his creation.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 85)

“This falling off the union through the Word and this getting far from away the “tree of life” it equals to people’s getting out from Paradise, out from the communion with God and amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 1995: 54)

“The people fallen from Paradise, they have developed this way of considering the universe, as a universe of objects, a universe whose superficial rationality can be known and it can be used in all kind of combinations or its material energies, discovered by them, in their pure bodily benefit. In this development of their imagining of their power upon nature as exclusively depending on them, or depending on some deities which were, actually, one with the people, as forces of the nature of-one-being with the people's forces, the people advanced in producing some gigantic masterpieces, as deceiving signs of their power, because the people didn't know about their spirit which they really can remain immortal through. So, the people erected the Babel Tower and the pyramids. But the haughtiness manifested in erecting the Babel Tower brought the people to the extent of no longer having the same language, or of no longer having the words as means of unity, and building the pyramids, was a practice of tormenting, with greater social power, the lower classes, by enslaving them to the work of building those monuments in order to "preserve" the rulers' bodies." (Stăniloae 1995: 54)

"Some people cannot accept this way of Christ. By and large, many people will continue to let themselves tempted, even after Christ Jesus told us everything, by the discovery of cosmic energies and by combining those energies in new forms of gigantism, which they think they ease their life through, and they make their bodily life more pleasant within this form of the universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 55)

"(...) the sin is influenced, in some regards, by the level of the knowledge and of the spiritual thinning the mankind reached at through Revelation. The sin can take more refined forms. Thus, the world is being carried by Revelation, generally forwards." (Stăniloae 2003: 39)

"For the first time, the sin was proven weak towards the human nature. The moment of temptation coincided to the moments in which the suffering element produced the culminating sufferings into the human nature of Jesus, offering the sin the maximum possibility to penetrate His being. If in those moments the sin cannot not penetrate His human nature, it won't ever do it. Into the temptation of the Lord, His human nature won a real victory over the sin, making it, for the first time, helpless. The unseen chiefs of the evil, they tried to slip into Him the temptation of avoiding the sufferings, being deceived by the presence of the suffering element in Him. The Lord sensed these chiefs who were stalking Him. But the temptation didn't penetrate Him neither for an instant. And, the fact itself that the Savior was for several times on the edge from which every man falls into the abyss of the sin, and He didn't fall servant to the temptation, it means a victory of the human nature and a weakening of the sin in report with the human nature.

This victory really reached the sin of the human nature, not just because He did not let His nature to kneel under the sin and He raised in it the will above the suffering, but also because Jesus identified Himself, in a certain sense, to the sin of all people.

On that universal scene, on which each of us was somehow present through the will of Jesus Christ, it was decided in good the fate of all the ones who would draw positive consequences for them, and all of them has gained the supremacy over the sin and over the death.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God has no interweaving with the sin. It is an order which He has placed it, depriving the egotist of tasting just the true joy of the existence. The sufferance, like repression of egocentrism, it is, in the same time, expiation for the sin in front of God. According to this fundamental order of the existence, any sin suffers, endures the godlike punishment. The godlike punishment is also the sufferance like path towards God. But it is a punishment through which God pulls us towards Himself.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Even if we understand more easily the connection between the good, we are doing and our spiritual growth like reward, according to the satisfaction which comes to us from the other, it is very hard to understand the enormous consequences of the egotistic obduracy, and of the spiritual diminishing, which are caused within us after our evil deeds. The effects appear to us disproportionately big in report with the deeds. But everything happens on the basis of a constant law, an iron law. If in the case of the good we feel our growth like an effect of the satisfaction which is projected upon us from another one, when we have done the evil we do not feel the diminishing like an effect of the dissatisfaction of the other, but it is like taking place by itself. It is, in the case of the evil done, rather the lack of love from the part of the others what causes the torment and the spiritual distortion in us, than the reflex of dissatisfaction for that one. In the consequences of the evil, like an intensification of it, like a punishment of it, we experience the abnormality of the state of non-communion, the torment of the existence deprived of the love of our fellow humans. It is also a relational state, but a negative one. The torment comes to us from our referring to others and from ascertaining that we do not find at them the love we need. We are not punished by a law, but by the fellow human, and not so much positively, but rather negatively, through the fact that he has no satisfaction anymore on us; he finds us no longer worthy of communion. The personal growth which we feel when we enjoy the love of the other one, and the diminishing we feel when we no longer enjoy his attention, it is a hint that through the other one it comes to us a plus of being, that the love means a placing of us closer to the core of the existence, to its center²³⁴, and the egotism is our exit to the outskirts of the existence... In this way is explained why the sacrifice, like an exceeding of the egotism, instead of being felt like a weakening of our existence, it is experienced like a way to enrichment. Thereby, the ethic is into an indissoluble unity with the ontological. More being it means more love, and better.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thus, we feel that in every man manifest not only a background of sin of the entire mankind, but also a force more powerful than the whole mankind together. The hereditary sin which agitates itself in each man, it is not only a common sin to all the people, but it must be conceived like an intersection of the evil spirit with the human nature. He is the expression of a communion with the evil spirit, with a personal hypostasis opposed to God and more powerful than all the people together. Through everybody's sin of man God is offended not only by the entire mankind, but also by the evil supra-human Spirit. Every man accumulates in his sinful deed everything that revolts against God. Of course, of a big part from this evil, the man is not guilty, being produced through his will, yet with a force above his will. From here it turns out the possibility for the man to be saved. Which cannot be the case with the evil spirit, which is himself the voluntarily source of the entire evil." (Stăniloae 1993)

²³⁴ L. Binswager, w. c. p. 197, 198, 200.

"It is true, objectively, that the offense brought to God, through everybody's sin, it means the offense brought by the whole mankind, including through the sin of the evil spirit. Thereby, the satisfaction which must be given to God it must be equivalent to this panhuman and more than human offense. Here is not about a satisfaction brought to God for the direct mutiny of the evil spirit. This one cannot be restored and so, redeemed. But here is about a satisfaction for the past work of the evil spirit, assumed through the will of the man, in a certain regard, against the man's will. It is a satisfaction for the sin which the man is responsible for, and which aims to get the man out from under the guilt. Through the man's will was manifested the work of the evil spirit, but, on one hand, not entirely, and on the other hand, man's will it acted by yielding under the pressure of a huge force." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Three are the problems comprised in this mysterious assuming of the human sin, done by Jesus Christ: a) how was He bearing, being sinless, the sin of the world? b) of what nature was the passing of the sin from people, to Him? and c) how He declared His agreement with Father, in order the righteous one to suffer for the unrighteous ones, to be spared of punishment the ones who sinned, and to be punished instead of them, the innocent one? Have we to deal here with a juridical trick?

Professor Sergei Bulgakov writes: "Jesus not only suffers from the part of the sins of the world, upraised against Him, but He impropriates them inside «through the compassionate love» (Metropolitan Antony) and, by making them as His own, He identifies His sinless human nature to the sinful nature of the former Adam. He, the light of the World, He deepens Himself into the darkness of the sin, in the night of Gethsemane of the sufferance for the sin. This identification is a voluntarily act of the God-the Man, by virtue of which He becomes the Lamb of God, which bears the sin of the World. How it is takes place this fact of sin assuming, this is the mystery of God-the Man, the only One sinless Who has made Himself guilty for the sin of the World" (Agnetz Bojii, p. 384).

It is here, truly, a mystery which we cannot claim to fully understand, in itself, but we will be content with the weak light which is dropped upon it by the pale analogies offered by the relations amongst people.

The Holy Scripture tells us about Jesus that "(Isa. 53: 6) LORD hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all", albeit "(Isa. 53: 9) He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth". The prophet predicts that "(Isa. 53: 11) by His knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for He shall bear their iniquities" and in the end He will be glorified because "(Isa. 53: 12) Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong; because He hath poured out His soul unto death". John the Baptist, with his gift as prophet, he unveils the character and the mission of Jesus in the short definition: "(Jn. 1: 29) Behold the Lamb of God Who removes the world's sin". And Paul the Apostle declares: "(Ga. 3: 13) Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, cursed is every one that hangs on a tree". And in another place, he tells more categorically: "(2 Co. 5: 21) For He hath made Him to be sin for us Who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him".

Sinless and though bearing the sins of the entire world, this is the great antinomy, the great mystery of the solidarity of Jesus with us. He didn't do any personal sins, neither with the word, nor with the deed, and it wasn't imprinted in His nature that inherited fund of sin. The sin was not a quality of His nature, it was not raising up from that nature, and there was no organic interweaving between that nature and the sin. He "was bearing" the sin, not "doing" the sin. That sin was a foreign one, of which He was not increasing through any adding, neither at least through an approval of the ones whom committed the sin. The sin of others was not assimilated in His nature or in His will, in order to become an active excrescence of them, an impulse towards the manifestation of the sin. It is not less true that Jesus was not behaving towards it like towards a foreign sin. Was not into Him the will to do the sin, but there was the state of spirit of the one who has done the sin and who regrets the fact of committing it. He was behaving towards the sin of the mankind like one who has done it and He is responsible, and He is guilty for it. He constituted Himself like a subject responsible for the sin, like a fact which was done and it is done through others, and not like a subject willing to do the sin. "Not they had sinned, but I had sinned; not they commit sin and will commit sin, but Me". These terms express the state of spirit of Jesus towards the sin of the people taken upon Him.

Jesus actually felt the pain, the regret, the responsibility for the sin of others. It was not a self-illusion which He had. We have indicated an analogy in the shame, in the pain, and in the guilt which the mother feels for the reproachable deed of her son. For how many times, though, we do not feel certain guilt for the sins of the one close to us, though we could not put the finger on somewhat participation or of our own advice, to do those sins. We feel that there exists a general inertia which pulls the people towards sin and to that inertia we have also our part, because the total configuration of the historical or human circumstances we have also a certain place. We feel guilty for the sins of the others if not through what we have done, at least through what we have not done for the straightening of the total failures of the human life. And no matter how much we would have done, we still are not content, we still are not tranquil that what we have done it is enough. Our simple presence like a man among people, we feel it like participation to the guilt of the sins which are done by others.

There cannot be any other explanation but that there it exists closeness, an interweaving, a hidden communication, and a more profound intimacy than we can accomplish between the individuals in whom it is being actualized the human nature. As we become more capable of understanding the closeness between us and our fellow humans, our solidarity with their sins is revealed to us²³⁵.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“That is why, while we have a special sensibility towards our responsibility for the sins of the ones who are close to us, we remain exterior and indifferent to the sins of the ones who are strangers to us.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The responsibility reminds of sin. When somebody presents himself to us like being responsible for a mistake, even if he has not done it, we are seeing at him attracted the thread of responsibility, and the sin. The objective condemnation of the sin, its compromising in front of everybody, it is done in this case by enduring some sufferings, by the person who has taken the responsibility, and by this, that person is the representative or the bearer of the sin, even without committing it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The sin is somehow crushed in itself; its power is taken, due to the expiatory sufferings which are coming after it. Although, the sin is not a self-standing hypostasis, so it can be condemned only through a human person. But by the fact that God condemns the sin through a person, who has not committed it, it shows, though, that not all the sinful persons are hated by Him, and He wants not to abolish them, but to abolish the sin. The people watching at the condemnation of the sin through the person of Jesus, the sinless One, they can realize that what God wants is to stigmatize the sin, and not the sinful person. He detaches from them their sin in order to condemn it, but God still lets the sin tied to a person at least somehow through an external connection. But He ties the sin to a sinless person, to not be possible to say that God hates the sinful man and not the sin. In the case of the sufferance of Jesus for the human sin, we have in the same time, the detachment of this sin on the contingent and varied plane, and its raising, onto a more general plan, like a quality which is hated, in itself, by God. But, in the same time, the general reality of the sin is depending on the concrete being of Jesus, being shown that He always has a concrete existence, being the manifestation of a man. The divine majesty and the moral order receive in this way their satisfaction, but into a person who, on one hand, by being sinless, He demonstrates that God doesn't allow the sufferance out of hate towards a person, and, on the other hand, by having the godhead like fundament of His humanity, He can endure such a huge sufferance without remaining forever crushed under the pressure on it. The Holy Scripture says how through Jesus Who ascended on the cross, God crucified the sin on the wood, and He abolished the sin²³⁶." (Stăniloae 1993)

²³⁵ This closeness is not constituted of an existential unity of all the people, from which the individuals would grow up only like some little rootlets, like affirms the Metropolitan Antony Hrapovitzchi, Zencowschi and, by and large, the Russian theological thinking. Antony says: “We must reject the idea that every person is a rounded whole, locked up in himself (microcosm) and to ask ourselves: lest there is not in all the people a common root, into which was kept the unity of our nature and in report with each different soul it appears a branch, though possessing a state of self and of liberty? The human self, in his full separation towards the «non - self» is, into an extended measure, an illusion. This illusion is hardened by our self-sensibility, developed on the basis of the sinful self-love, characteristic to the decayed humanity” (apud G. Florovschi, Puti Ruskago Bogoslovie, Paris, 1937, p. 429). There exists a common will of the entire mankind. This unity, which is not only spiritual, but it is also essential, real, it is revealed in the Church and in the future life. “In the future life this unity will manifest more powerfully than the multiplicity of the human persons”. “Through this Christ has saved us, that, by being in a deep unity with us, His sufferance from love has become to us a source of victory upon the sin”. “Why the spiritual torments of Christ for the human sinfulness, were to us for salvation? Because His together suffering love (sostradatelnaia liubov), it has united His spirit with our souls and we have sipped for them, from the spirit of Christ, like from a water spring of holiness and, through this, we have defeated the sin” (w. c. p. 430). We do not affirm a unity of persons in the sense of their reduction at a single deep self, at that there is a single background of substance. But, without any doubt, the mankind is a region of the existence, in its own way, a whole. The singular persons are close to one another, they understand each other, they communicate. This is so much than the “self” cannot live without “you”. There is a unity between people in the sense of a whole of “selves” who still preserves their individuality. The mankind constitutes a “Wirrheit”, like L. Binswanger says, w. c. But only love creates this.

²³⁶ . Pt. 2: 24: "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed."; II Co. 5: 21: "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him"; Ro. 8: 3: "For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh". Saint Maximos the Confessor develops the idea that, while to the other people the death has the meaning to condemn the nature for its attachment to sin, at Jesus Who had not sin, for at His birth the lust didn't preside, the death has no longer the meaning to disintegrate the nature, but to dissolve the sin. Through death, His nature is liberated from the passion of the sin. "The death, derived after the disobedience, it was reigning over entire nature, by having like ground the voluptuousness which has its beginning in the first disobedience. Because of it, the nature was surrender to death. Though, God, by making Himself man and by not assuming like source of His birth according to the body the unfair pleasure, due to which it was brought against the nature the right condemnation through death, but by voluntarily receiving death in his suffering nature, according to the nature, namely enduring it, He has changed the meaning of the death, no longer being a condemnation of the nature, but of the sin. Because the death was impossible to be, to the one who does not have His existence out of lust, a condemnation of the nature; now death has become the abolishment of the ancestral sin, due to which the fear of death was reigning over the whole nature. If in Adam the death was a condemnation of the nature, which had the voluptuousness like origin of coming to existence, rightly speaking, the death in Jesus has become a condemnation of the sin, the nature receiving again in Him a beginning of the existence, clean of any voluptuousness. In this way, as the sin condemned, in Adam, the nature to corruption in death, due to the voluptuousness..., likewise in Jesus, due to the righteousness, the nature condemned the sin, for the nature was disrobed in Jesus, totally, of the provenance out of voluptuousness... Thereby, the same death in Adam exists for the condemnation of the nature due to the sin, and in Jesus for the condemnation of the sin due to the righteousness. The first one, by suffering due to the sin towards the condemnation of the nature, he justly suffers death; the second one, by not suffering due to the sin, He voluntarily receives death, which is the cause of the sin, for the sin's abolishment." Into the old man, death is a weapon of the sin, for the destruction of the nature; into the one who lives in Christ, death is a weapon of the nature towards the destruction of the sin. Quaest. ad Thalassium 61, G.P. 90, 633 D – 636 A B, 637 A.

This composition of the things, it doesn't have, though, only an artificial character, but it is based on the ethical interweaving of the human destinies. What we told before about the ethical seriousness of the assuming of the responsibility for the sin of the other one, and about the real sufferance which this solidarity brings with itself, it comes together into a wider meaning with what we have just said about this divine composition." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The creature, which sinned against God, he must be abolished from the way of existence which the sin was committed in.

But the destruction cannot it be the last word of God, if we regard the death like an order left by Him for the sinner creature, or the sin cannot have the last word even if its presence causes the death. That is why, the death is a destruction only on the seen plan. God wants, in principle, the man to be saved. And the salvation is accomplished through Jesus for the ones who adhere to Him. In this case, the existence of the man, instead of diminishing in the external plan, it reaches its plenitude. But on the plan from here, even if some people are liberated of sin and guilt, their being can no longer enjoy the plenitude, no matter how much their being is renewed through Jesus Christ. Their being, in the same way like the one of the others, must pass through death. The sin, introduced into the human nature, it has produced into the human nature certain modifications, certain debility, which remains even when the sin was banished from it. The death remains also to the saved ones, with the meaning to make the human being to pass through a radical change of structure, produced through his total deepening into the eclipse of any existence, in order the existence from after that to have a totally new shape than the one from here, and to have been disappeared from the human nature everything that reminds of sin. The moment of the death, like a pause, like a total interruption, like a full ceasing of the actuality of the subject, like a deepening of him into the depth of the virtuality, it is a moment of mysterious elaboration of the new being on the eternal plan. On this moment of deepening, it happens to the human subject, like in a mysterious and creative retort, that divine work of transformation, of new structuring. It is a deepening into the hand of God, from Whom emerged the first existence. After the transformative pause, the man wakes up to the new existence, a happy and plenary one." (Stăniloae 1993)

Soul

“The soul can gather and influence through body, the whole world, and above this it is a subjective rationality and endlessly rich through the connection with the superior order.” (Stăniloae 2003: 393)

“Not being from the general creation, the soul cannot disappear in the same time with it, in the same time with the dissolving of the individual body. The soul is the product of the eternal conscious spirit Who, by thinking the rational principles of the matter and materializing these principles, He brings to existence in front of these materialized principles, but connected to them, a conscious soul in His image, a soul who to think these principles and who to spiritualize the material reality in which these principles are imprinted through the union with the eternal conscious Spirit. The man’s soul is destined to elevate the things’ rational principles to their union with the eternal principles of the world thought by God, in a dialogue of knowing and of collaborating with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 393)

“The man, this created image of the eternal conscious Spirit, the man is no longer brought to existence as general materialized rationality, a thought one, but as a factor that himself thinks at himself, and he thinks all the other things, likewise the Logos. Here takes place an interruption in the creator action of the eternal conscious Spirit. The conscious soul is no longer brought to existence through the simple thinking and commandment of the Creator spirit, but by having a character of subject since the beginning, he is called to existence, through some sort of re-duplication of the Creator spirit on a created plan.” (Stăniloae 2003: 393)

“We specify that no matter how well prepared would be the apparition of the human body through a driving of the inferior nature towards him, as actual body it doesn’t exist before the soul, likewise the soul doesn’t start existing through Creation (which is a calling too) before his individual adequate body starts forming.” (Stăniloae 2003: 395)

“Like the body doesn’t start forming by itself, or through a previous process, but it has the soul in it, since the beginning, as factor that differs from the body’s nature, likewise the soul doesn’t exist before his body starts forming. The concomitant beginning of their existence presupposes a very intimate involvement of the soul and of the body, which makes impossible to be understood separately a body and a soul as such. We must admit this concomitant beginning and in tight involvement of the two factors, since the body cannot be understood alone as part of the nature that exceeds itself. On the other hand, the human soul cannot be understood before the body to exists, because of in this case the body wouldn’t have been partaker from the beginning to the man’s character of subject and it would have repercussions upon the entire life of the man and upon man’s connection with the nature, by keeping the soul within body like in a dungeon, and in front of the nature as in front of a stranger reality which the soul cannot transfigure and which cannot enrich the soul, as the Platonic-Origenistic theory reckons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 395)

“By the fact that, not even for a moment, the soul or the body exists by themselves, the Christian teaching prefers to speak not about the man’s spirit, but about soul. This is because of through spirit one would understand an entity that hasn’t any qualification that would be due to the coexistence with the body. That’s why, to the Christian teaching, the spirit isn’t within man an entity differing from the soul, but the spirit is the superior functions of the soul, which are less dedicated to taking care of the body and they are more dedicated to the thinking, a thinking that can go up to the thinking of his Creator.” (Stăniloae 2003: 396)

“The union between soul and body in the unity of the human person it is a special mystery because of the man-species, that unites the nature with the spirit, it represents the conscious and free spiritual factor inserted in the nature as soul. This fact gives our person the possibility to contingently use the nature. The insertion of the spirit in the material nature is so intimate, so that the spiritual human factor cannot be conceived even for a moment as pure spirit, but it must be understood from the beginning as soul, or as embodied spirit, as spirit with his ramifications within body, or as body with root into spirit.” (Stăniloae 2003: 397)

“The human nature as unity between soul and body on the purpose of making the world transparent to God, it has its origin in a special creator act of God. This special origin is shown in a totally particular mode in the insertion of the spirit into nature as soul, from the first moment of the existence of the human nature, or as constitutive factor of the human nature. The soul is created by a special act of God in order to use the world in a dialogue with God. Only due to this fact the soul is awakened in a world he hasn’t created, but which he ascertains it as adequate to him, as put at his disposal. The human soul is created by God in a special mode, for it is endowed with features related to the features of God: conscience, cognitive rationality, and freedom. The human soul is summoned to a free dialogue with God through knowledge and deeds, to freely use the world as a gift from God, in order to answer through it to the love of God Who has given him the world; and in order the man to prolong through the world the dialogue of love with his fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 403-404)

“In the older theology the teaching about the soul’s immortality was founded on the idea about the soul’s indestructible spiritual, simple substance. But if this teaching is a simple teaching of the faith, and not of the philosophy, the soul’s immortality must be founded on the faith that God wants the soul to be immortal. So, this belief isn’t founded on an indestructibility the soul would have in himself, even without the will of God. If the soul has indestructibility, this has its cause in the conservative and creator will of God Who wants the human person to be, through soul, ceaselessly, dependent on Him. God has endowed the soul with the memory of his deeds, with self-consciousness, in order the soul to relentlessly regret his deeds contrary to God, in order the soul to ceaselessly know about his dependence on God, and in order to pray God and to love God ceaselessly.” (Stăniloae 1997: 158)

“In the beginning, God endowed the soul with His grace, and after the embodiment of His Son as man and after His Resurrection, Christ Himself dwelled Himself within man, or Christ has dressed the man in Himself through Baptism. That’s why, an important reason why the soul of the believers is immortal, it is the fact that Christ dwells within them, or that the Son of God Who has made Himself man forever, he has become the believers’ house and clothing. How could this dwelling of Christ be destroyed by death? How could be Christ, as clothing and dwelling of the soul, to be deprived of one of His dwellings or of one of His inhabitants? “For we know that if our earthly dwelling will be detached, in this tent, we have in heavens built by God, eternal house, not made by human hand. That’s why we sigh in this body, wanting to dress ourselves up in our dwelling from heaven, if we will be clothed, but not naked.” (2 Cor. 5: 1-2).” (Stăniloae 1997: 158)

“The Holy Scripture categorically affirms the existence and the work of the soul after death. We are mentioning here the place from the Second Epistle towards Corinthians (5: 6-8): “We have the good trust and we are glad to not dwell into body, but to dwell to the Lord”. And then we have the Epistle towards Philippians (1: 22). Let’s also mention the Ecclesiastes (12: 7): “And let the dust turn back on earth, as it was, and the soul turn to God Who gave him”. Then, we have the Parable of the rich man and of the poor Lazarus, in which we can see that these ones live also after their death and after the general resurrection of the bodies, so that they live with the soul (Lk. 16: 19 and the followings). Finally, we have many places in the Apocalypse (4: 10-11, 5: 8-14 etc.), where it speaks about the twenty-four old men, who worship the Lamb; or where it speaks about the great multitude standing before the Lamb’s throne (7, 9: 1-14); or where it speaks about the ones living in heavens (13: 6: 14: 3: 14: 13: 15: 2 etc.). Then it speaks about the “souls of the ones stabbed for the word of God, who stay under the altar from heavens” (Apoc. 6: 9).” (Stăniloae 1997: 159)

“The soul’s eternal existence, even in hell, it equals to a soul’s “spiritual” life. This is very important to Saint Maximos: that without a soul, there is nothing to last. Without a soul everything is in a continuous doing and undoing – there is no longer God either. This is because a God Who can no longer create beings with an eternal indestructibility, in order these beings to eternally think at Him (or against Him), God would be proven as conditioned and limited to a relation with an eternal impersonal process, with an eternal law of the doing-undoing.” (Stăniloae 1997: 183-184)

“The Holy Fathers borrowed the conception upon the soul mostly from Aristotle, who is not different from Plato’s to, except by that that he refuses the preexistence of the mind (νοῦς), or of the spirit, and therefore its separation from soul. According to this conception, the soul – though one in essence, it has three main faculties: the mind, as potentiality of all the acts of knowing and thinking; the lust as potentiality of all the desires and lusts: and the irascible potentiality, impulsive, of the courage acts, of manhood, of good or bad anger. The rationality would be a function of the mind. When the rationality is considered in the place of the mind, the soul still has three powers: the rationality, the lust, and the impulsiveness.” (Stăniloae 1992: 71)

“We must notice that, even if the Holy Fathers reject the platonic idea of separation between mind and soul, as passionate and lusting whole, namely the idea of the mind’s preexistence, though they consider that the two powers are kindred to each other and they differ from the mind in such a measure that, the Holy Fathers spoke, on the other hand, about two parts of the soul: the mental part, or spiritual, or rational, and the irrational part which comprises, together with other vital functions, the faculties of the pride and of the lust.” (Stăniloae 1992: 71)

“The Holy Fathers adhered in some measure to the platonic thesis about the νοῦς’s immortality and about the immortality of the other two powers, by the fact that, according to them, as we exemplified before by quoting some places from Saint Maximos the Confessor, only νοῦς is destined to the eternal life, the anger and the lust as headquarters of the affect having to cease at the end of the life on earth.” (Stăniloae 1992: 72)

“But the mind, far from being different from the soul, it is the soul itself. The anger and the lust are powers accompanying the mind during the life on earth, a life born out of the association between soul and body. They are functions characteristic to the care for the body, and they are influenced by the mind’s connection with the body. Of course, they do not exclusively belong to the body, because of the body being in itself inert. They represent energy of the soul, oriented towards the body, and colored by the cohabitation with the body. The energy of the desire and of the manhood the soul has them in itself, and the soul will have them also after the life from here. The ones ceasing then they will be the lust and the anger, as we know them on earth, in their bodily and irrational element. The energy from them, spiritualized, it will be exclusively oriented towards God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 72)

“Understood as soul himself, the mind (νοῦς), or the soul himself, related to whom the lust and the anger have an external position, the mind is, at its turn, threefold. Kallistos the Katafygiote considers the soul as being mind, rationality, and ghost, in the likeness of the Holy Trinity. This threefold aspect doesn’t diminish the soul’s simplicity by any means.” (Stăniloae 1992: 72)

“The conception about the soul is of a paramount importance, helping us to understand a multitude of things related to the mysterious life of the soul. According to Saint Mark the Ascetic, Christ places Himself, at Baptism, in our heart’s altar, or in the most inner part of our being, and we do not realize this aspect from the beginning, but we become aware of this by gradually changing ourselves. The same thing was said by Diadochus of Photice, according to whom, since the moment of the Baptism, the grace “hides in the deep of the mind”, satan being cast outside and from now on influencing us through the body’s senses and through the irrational lusts’ sweetness. From here it comes that there is a deep or an interior of our mind unknown by us, but which we will gradually become aware of, if we strive to clean up our life. This deep is called by Mark the Ascetic as “heart”. This teaching allows us to establish connection bridges between the Christian teaching and the modern psychology, although the Christian doctrine comprises something that is a completion of this psychology. Most of the modern psychology, it admits the existence of a subconscious in order to reserve a space where the memories would be stored, and where are born the ideas, the inspiration, the intuitions, and the tendencies.” (Stăniloae 1992: 72-73)

“As one can see, the Christendom admits the existence of a soul’s region that doesn’t fall under the light of the conscience. Although, the term of subconscious isn’t appropriate to indicate this region, both because of the particle “sub” places it in an inferior, subordinated area, and because of being loaded with the Freudian heredity too, of so many too shameful to be confessed thoughts, which the conscience keeps repulsing, because of being ashamed to unveil them. By admitting that there is also a subconscious for the dark load we carry within us, we reckon as more appropriate for naming the region where the virtual energies of the human soul are virtually comprised, and through which the divine energies enter the soul, to use the term of trans-conscious, or of supra-conscious. The subconscious would be so the pantry to the left, or the dark dungeon of the conscience, where our evil deeds have been gathered, and it would be the place where the lust and the anger start from. And the trans-conscious or the supra-conscious would be the pantry to the right, or the upper room, where are stored and where work the superior energies, ready to flood our conscious life and even the subconscious, with their cleaning force, when we offer them the necessary conditions.” (Stăniloae 1992: 73)

“Thus, the soul’s “ghost” it would be the highest part, or the most inner part, for in the soul’s order what is higher, it is more inwardly, more intimate. We think the term “heart” refers to this part too. For instance, Diadochus of Photice used, for the intimate place from within soul, where the grace hides since Baptism, alternatively, the expression “the mind’s deep”, the word “heart”, and the word “ghost”. (Stăniloae 1992: 73-74)

“Amongst the three aspects of the soul, the most unveiled to us it is the rationality, this one seemingly having the role of revealing like, related to the Holy Trinity, this role it belongs to the divine Logos. The mind, with its more direct possibilities of knowing, namely of knowing the spiritual things, it is less unveiled to us. Almost totally it is unveiled to us the “ghost” or the “heart”, for the “ghost” lives in our deeps, as the Holy Ghost lives in the deeps of the godhead (I Cor. 2: 11). Like the Holy Ghost, our ghost descends in the conscious and subconscious regions of our surface life, of contact with the seen world, only after he has prepared our rationality for receiving Him. Our “heart” is locked up while we live a life of callousness and of sin. About such a man they say that he is “not having a heart”, or that “he has a stone heart”, namely in state of not-working. And the life “into ghost” is totally absent to this man. This man doesn’t have except a “rationality” lacking any depth. Our “heart” is being opened to us, is being widened by the hope in God, as said Mark the Ascetic. Otherwise, our heart is narrowed, locked up with cares. And “the life in ghost”, the “knowing of Christ into ghost”, expressions used by Maximos the Confessor, it means knowing Christ as dwelling within us, in our central intimacy. They say also that the “ghost” or the “spiritual life” it means the union between our self and the godlike Ghost, letting us the impression that we wouldn’t have in this sense any region of the soul called “ghost”, before encountering God. But we have a “ghost “within us, as a region where the Holy Ghost will settle in, but until Christ or the Holy Ghost do not dwell there it is a simple virtuality, and after that firstly is unknown to us and we gradually become aware of that on the measure we advance in virtues and, by this, we advance in the conscience of having Jesus within us. Only after that we grow up consciously in a spiritual life. This is in the same time a heart’s life, for the life is the power of love; it is the soul open towards God and towards the fellow humans; and the life in ghost is a life of love for God and for our fellow humans, for the Ghost is, in the Holy Trinity too, always love. Through this openness, the soul actualizes, in the same time his connection with the infinite, his potentiality of communicating with the infinite, of receiving the infinite within himself, of uniting himself with the infinite. By descending the Holy Ghost within us, and by collaborating to achieving the virtues, as openness toward God and towards our fellow humans, our ghost is being “lit up” too, it is being thawed, our heart is being mellowed, and our soul's walls become transparent to God. The love of God awakens our love; God's penetration within us makes us to open ourselves to God." (Stăniloae 1992: 74-75)

"The heart, or the loving state of the soul, it has in the Orthodox Christendom a gnoseological function too, and the true understanding of the mind is in the same time love for the understanding's object or subject. "Ghost" is an aspect and vouç is another aspect, of the same simple soul. The "ghost" or the "heart" comprises the "mind" in himself, or "the understanding" and the "rationality", like the Holy Ghost comprises the Father and the Son. Also, the "understanding" comprises in itself the "heart", or the "love" and the "rationality", and the "rationality" comprises the "understanding" and the "love". (Stăniloae 1992: 75)

"One could say that the psychic energies of the lust and of the anger are involved in the energy that is in the upper room of the soul, in the "ghost" or in his "heart", and the more diminished is the life of the "heart", or of the "ghost", or the less those ones use their energy, the more increased is the energy of the bodily lust and anger." (Stăniloae 1992: 75)

"Each one's conscience is characteristic to his soul, though everybody's souls are of a common nature too, as their bodies as well, and the souls' nature is communicative through the bodies and, in a way, through the physical universe too." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 28)

"The soul is brought to existence by the will of God, not only concomitantly to the body coming from the parent's bodies, but also in an untold unity with the body born out of parents: better said, it is a soul having within himself the powers corresponding to the material body that starts to be formed, and not without the work of the soul at its conceiving by parents. That's why the born ones can be called also according to their souls, as children of their parents. It is impossible to concretely distinguish between body and soul. Their untold unity is so great, that one can say that the one who is born he inherits the ancestral sin in the whole his being. God brings to existence a soul according to the fallen human nature, but also according to the person whom He actualizes. And in this soul are placed the powers working for forming the corresponding body, even since the human being's conceiving. The parents aren't the sole cause for bringing the children to existence, though they are used as factors occasioning the conceiving and the forming of the children, and the parents give, out of their bodies, the material matter for the children's bodies, bodies which are organized under the influence of their souls; but also, each soul corresponds to the body he is within." (Stăniloae 1995: 173-174)

“During the human being’s present life, the soul isn’t, either for a moment, without a body, neither is a body without a soul. They aren’t contrary by their being, but they complete one another, though they can become contrary to one another. In the soul, there are the power which form the body out of material matter, and in the soul are also the powers working through the body. The soul doesn’t start existing except together with the body. Through the power withing him, the soul elevates the material matter on the middle level of the spiritual life. The soul starts transforming the material matter into a body right from the conceiving of the new human being. Right from that moment, the human being is composed of soul and body.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 83)

Space

“God is above space because the space limits. But in the same time, He is present in the whole space, without the parts of the space to be inscribed in Him. God is above the space as He is also above time, He being above a “when” and a “where”, as also He is above “how”, because all of these would limit Him, they would determine Him, and they would define Him. He is above these for He is above any system of references, as supra-existent, or apophatic. But He is in all things in a non-spatial and non-temporal mode, for all the things receive their existence through Him. He is in all the things, for He is in all His acts which are referring us, acts which are creator, sustainer, and consummator, acts through which He enters our system of references, or our plan of existence, for He is The One Who produces and determines these acts, and makes Himself accessible through them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 205)

“God is supra-spatial as subject Who is above composition, apophatic. But consummate subject he can be only in perfect communion with other supreme, infinite subjects. And just by doing that, in Him it is given also the possibility of the space, for in the difference between the divine Persons it is given the possibility of the alterity of some finite persons, who to be attracted to the communion with Himself. And the finite persons, by not being in the beginning in a perfect communion amongst them and between them and God, the distance separating them from the consummate communion it takes the shape of the space, like it also takes the shape of the temporal duration. Thus, the space it is the form of the relation between the supra-spatial and infinite God and the finite persons, the form that makes possible their movement amongst them, but through this it makes also possible their movement towards God, because God cannot be found outside the communion with other persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 205-206)

“But God isn’t monotonous in His creator action. He also created subjects clothed in material bodies, in order to make out of the material forms an environment of spirituality and therefore images of a visible beauty. These subjects clothed in material bodies, they need an adjacent experience, and therefore they need a space. And they even need a wide space for movement. This is because like the time is given for the freedom of the created subjects, likewise is given the space for their freedom to get closer or to move away, or to remain at the distances which are between them. There is given a time and a space for maintaining the “longing” or the “desire” amongst the created subjects, but also in order to give them the possibility to move away in case they do not love each other.” (Stăniloae 2003: 206)

“The Holy Trinity cannot show His visible image except in the created beings, which are placed in a common space. In this sense, the space as common environment of the human persons stays in a direct connection with the Holy Trinity. But like the Trinitarian Person are interior to one another, likewise the human persons are partially spiritually interior to one another, and they can become increasingly interior to one another, and with this they are somehow present in the whole space, or they are above the space.” (Stăniloae 2003: 206)

“In the Holy Trinity it is given both the origin of the space and the unity of the space, through the difference amongst the human person and through the unity amongst them. Each human person has in himself the whole space, or he is connected to the whole space, for his body is explained out of everything that is in space, and the soul has a content gathered up out of the whole space. And the persons united amongst them, they bear together the whole space. The space is a unity bore by each person and in common by all the human persons; but the space though it is surpassed by the human persons in a unity of them that is beyond space. It is shown in this too, the quality of the human persons of being bearer of the image of God, One in being and threefold in Persons, existing a not-confounded unity amongst all the human persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 206-207)

“Understanding the space out of a purely individual perspective it is impossible. It is true that each human person considers himself, somehow, as a center of the space, but on the other hand he gravitates towards the other persons, establishing equilibrium between him, as center of the space, and the other persons, as centers of the same space. If there had been a sole human person, he wouldn't have needed space and he would have felt himself lonely in that space or it would have considered that space as unreal.” (Stăniloae 2003: 207)

“When we say that God has conceived and has created the space, we must bear in mind God the Holy Trinity. In a God Who was a sole Person, there wouldn't have been a sufficient reason for creating the space. The space is tightly tied to the interpersonal communion. The space gains and maintains a surer reality when I refer it not only to myself but also to other persons, when I can say and I ought to say: from me to that person there is that much distance.” (Stăniloae 2003: 207)

“The space is also a tormenting reality – if somebody uses it for avoiding the communion -, and it is a positive reality – when it serves as environment for manifesting a communion that is not confounded. Like the time, the space too can be used in an ambiguous manner, but it is always used as a form of a relation. The space gives the human being the possibility to withdraw from before another person, but also to approach that person. The space is given as an interval but also as a connection between man and man, as the time is too. We can preserve and increase this interval, but we also can reduce it and totally overwhelm it, as we can do too with the interval of the time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 207-208)

“The space, as reality for the world, it is given to be surpassed by realizing a perfect communion between us and God, and amongst us, in the likeness of the Holy Trinity. Thus, the space it has its origin and its end in the Holy Trinity, as the time too.” (Stăniloae 2003: 208)

“In both these sides of the interval there is God with his eternity and omnipresence, as a ridge and as a force that attracts the people and it urges one towards another, and towards God. The spatial distance it represents a temporal duration too. In order to surpass the first one, I must surpass the second one too. But I can be very close to someone from spatial point of view, and in the same time to be at a great distance spiritually, fact that equals to a great temporal duration I must travel. Surpassing the spatial distance to a person it still doesn't mean exceeding the temporal duration top that person. The temporal duration it is itself a distance and it wants to cause a spatial distance. Once surpassed the temporal duration between two persons, the spatial distance between them it almost doesn't matter anymore, or, however, it is easier to conquer. Once surpassed the spiritual distance, or the temporal duration, the spatial distance loses its tormenting character, or the surpassing of the first one it easier brings the surpassing of the last one. This highlights the fact that the spirit overcomes the space, and that the space no longer matters to the ones who are united in spirit. What distances more profoundly it is the temporal duration. God as Ghost is everywhere with us. And surpassing the distance between us and Him it is a matter of time, and not of space.” (Stăniloae 2003: 208-209)

“The duration is overcome through spirit. And since the duration has been overcome, it has been overcome the space too through spirit.” (Stăniloae 2003: 209)

“The space existing through the relation between us it is “our space”, and not mine. A space only for me, it wouldn't make any sense – it would be tormenting.” (Stăniloae 2003: 211-212)

“God wants to overcome the interval (diastase) between Him and the persons, not only through His movement, but also through their free movement towards Him. This is because as long as the creature manifests a will inconsistent with His will, there remains a distance between Him and the creature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 289-290)

Spirituality /
Spiritualization

"(...) the spiritualization it is the gradual showing of the presence of Christ through the being of the believers, a being that is transformed, in an ascending direction, or it is continuously thinned as understanding, as sensitiveness, as decency and love in relationships, and as penetration in the complexity and in the profoundness of the divine reality and of the human reality united with the divine reality." (Stăniloae 2003: 111)

"The Orthodox spirituality aims to consummate the believer in Christ. And as the consummation cannot be achieved in Christ except by participating to His divine-human life, one can say that the target of the Orthodox spirituality it is the consummation of the believer through union with Christ and through his ever-higher imprinting by the image of the Christ's humanity which is full of God." (Stăniloae 1992: 5)

"One can say that the target of the Christian Orthodox spirituality is the union of the believer with God, in Christ. But as God is endless, the target of the union with Him, or of our consummation, it does never correspond to an end, which one cannot advance anywhere from. All the Eastern Fathers say, therefore, that the consummation is borderless." (Stăniloae 1992: 5-6)

"The Christian Orthodox spirituality has the following traits: 1. The culminant state of the spiritual life it is a union of the soul with God, lived and experimented. 2. This union is accomplished through the work of the Holy Ghost, but until obtaining it the man owes a long effort of purification. 3. This union is accomplished when the man has reached "the likeness of God" and it is in the same time knowledge and love. 4. The effect of this union consists, amongst others, of a considerable intensification of the spiritual energies within man, accompanied by all kinds of charismas." (Stăniloae 1992: 6)

"The Christian spirituality considers in addition to this "union" only a gradual increasing and especially a noticing of it through conscience. It is possible this increasing and this noticing from the part of the man through conscience? The Holy Fathers, by affirming this capacity, they reckon as means which this capacity can be achieved through, the cleaning of the soul and of the mind of worldly preoccupations." (Stăniloae 1992: 16)

"Totally different is the mythology. In it there is no preoccupation with the gradual spiritual growth of the man or of the mankind, either from the human part or from the part of the pretended miraculous forces, for themselves are far from what the spirituality means in the proper meaning of the word." (Stăniloae 2005: 43)

"In general terms we have seen that the Christian teaching adopts an average between the identity's mystique and the irreducible separation between man and God. Its justification will be proven by presenting two extreme theses concerning this matter.” (Stăniloae 1992: 14)

“The Orthodoxy preferred, especially during the period of the Holy Fathers and in the writings of the great ones who live/lived the union with God, in order to express the content of the term Mysticism”, to use the terms of: “life into Christ”, “life into Ghost”, “spiritual life”, “life into God”, in order to express the Christian’s life in union with God, no matter the level which this union will be on. The Orthodoxy has been following, in this regard, the example of Saint Apostle Paul (Gal. 3: 28; 3: 20, II Cor. 4: 11; I Cor. 7: 8; 3: 16; 2: 12; Rom. 8: 15; 8: 9-10; Ephes. 3: 16-17; Col. 3: 3; Jn. 14: 23; 1 Jn. 3: 24 etc.).” (Stăniloae 1992: 31)

Sufferance

“This state of pain and death must not be considered as a punishment for ever imposed us by God. God, for love, he always works as love and just through these difficulties He brings us to repentance.” (Stăniloae 2003: 508)

“The pain and the death, as consequences of the sin, they also become means against the sin, not only because they stop us from endlessly repeating the sin, but also because they become crossing towards the real life. How can this be explained? By the fact that the spirit is being strengthened by enduring sufferance and death. On the other hand, our being endures the pain by knowing that, by opposing the pain to the pleasure, our being gets out from egotism and opens himself to God; our being endures death for he knows that death isn't the ultimate reality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 509)

“The pain and the death surpass positively the corruption and the death, for they are endured with the faith in God. In this sense they are also a sacrifice brought to God, when they are endured with faith in Him and without protesting. But not only into Christ, has the death fully fulfilled its purpose of defeating death. The man, opposing himself the pleasure by accepting the pain and the death, he defeats the pleasure and the pain. But the man doesn't oppose the satisfying of any bodily need, namely to the irreproachable affects, which entered the nature through sin. They are necessary in order to sustain the life, but also for the occasion they give the man's effort to stop satisfying what is beyond necessary. The man must remain the guard of a border. There he encounters God. The sad state our being has reached in, because of the sin, it is due to the falling off the ontological-dialogical connection with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 510)

“Often, the pains from during the life aren't smaller than the pains of death. But we must endure those too, out of love for God, as a kind of our surrender to Him. As Saint Apostle Paul says: “Neither death, nor life (in pleasures, or the life we cannot endure) ... not to separate us from the love of God, that one into Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 157-158)

“The suffering is discovered on this way, grace to Christianity, in what it can actually be, in its ennobled shape, like a dynamic center of the unification of the humanity, of gathering the mankind from the demonic scattering, into the Kingdom of the heavenly Father.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Even if before Jesus Christ there had been a man or another capable of a sufferance which - through its purity and intensity - to bring that man's being beyond sin, he could have had this effect only for his own being. No matter how much would a man suffer, the maximum of his sufferance does not exceed the limits of his personal capacities, manifested also into sin. No man could suffer more than the equivalent of his sin, in the case in which the sufferance would form indeed a pure phase of his existence.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But until now we have spoken more on the effect of the sufferance of a man upon his own sin. Is there any effect of the foreign sufferance over our own sin? The sufferance of a person, out of love, for another person, it has upon that person, in fact, a beneficial effect. It is just the supreme beneficial force which exercises from man to man, because the love manifests here the fullest intensity. This influence is explained through some un-suffering impropriation of the sufferance of another person by the one for whom that person suffered. The most powerful influence upon her the son is exercised by his mother, who suffers for her son’s transgressions: in case of the husband, the most powerful influence is exercised upon him by his wife who suffers. We have here an arrow towards the mysteries of the interweaving of the human destinies, of the interdependency and communication between them. The bodily separation from the surface between the human hypostases has accustomed us to not see their intimacy into depth, bases of the unity of the human nature and on love. The ethic structure itself, of the man, it is based on this possibility of substitution of a self through another one, into love. If I cannot help other person through my sufferance, if I cannot make that person better, what it will be given us for, this inclination of our being to suffer for that person? And what will remain from the ethic character of the man, if that man doesn’t feel the impulse to suffer in the place of another, and if he feels the inutility of such a substitutive sufferance? But the influence from man to man, even when is exercised by the supreme force of the suffering love, it is extremely relative. We have said that the sufferance of a man, even if it reaches the ultimate intensity and purity, it won’t be able melt down, in depth and in totality, the ground of the sin and of the sinful inclination from another person.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If the sufferance of a man for another man it proves to be powerless for radically healing him of the gangrene of his sin, the beneficial influence which it exercises though, it shows us, in principle, the possibility of purification through a substitutive sufferance.

Out of the thing said above, it also comes out the conditions which have to be fulfilled by a subject in order his sufferance to have a universal substitutive power. That subject must be human, in order to feel the whole pain of the man for sin, in order to humanly suffer and to be into a connection of nature with people to communicate them the entire force which dissolves the sin. But that man must be pure and to be more than a man; he must be more than all the people, for the human pain which he bears to have intensity and a depth like it would have of all people together, if they would not be sinners. Only God can fulfill the last condition. This would be seen also in other considerations. The subject capable by a universal substitutive sufferance must be, in the same time, man and God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If into a man hasn’t taken place the demolishing of the old creature, like through a fully personal sufferance, if it hasn’t taken place within him a re-creator quake, through a seeing and not suffering assumption of the entire sufferance of Jesus Christ for world and for him, that man will remain like he was, with that fund of sin.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God does not save the people without sacrifice, without sufferance, and especially without a sufferance equivalent to the whole fund of sin from the people. But, even if we have indicated that this sacrifice was brought according to an order placed by God at the basis of the moral order, though, because we have tried to throw more light upon the organic liaison between sufferance and sin, it is possible to have caused the impression that we haven’t sufficiently highlighted the report between the sacrifice and the justice of God, but only with His love. That’s why, it is necessary to stop ourselves in a more special way upon this point²³⁷.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Christ leads the work of killing the former man within us, not only by the power he gives us, from outside to inside, in order to willingly fight the sinful habits, but also through our trials and tribulations of all sorts which he allows to come upon us. If we accept these tribulations, they gradually purify us; if we rebel against them, we sink ourselves even more into sin. Christ is the One giving us the power for endure the tribulations. In this sense, He participates together with us to enduring the tribulations, and also in this sense, he humbles Himself together with us, by burying Himself in a kenosis, in a death which He repeats in the life of each of us. This is the death which, in the same time, it is an ascent.” (Stăniloae 1992: 44)

²³⁷ The unilateral tendency to consider the salvation of the people like being accomplish like an exclusively subjective process, under the loving influence of Christ, it is represented at the Orthodox by Metropolitan Antony Hrapovitzchi, who, otherwise, deserves a particular consideration for the fact that he highlighted the great reality and saving force of the substitutive sufferance. Antony explains the cleansing power of the substitutive sufferance through a too exaggerated unity between people, which, according to him, it has some sort of a common basis, a unitary self. G. Florovschi reproaches him the tendency towards psychologism and pietism. “He does not reach the objectivity; he does not reach the metaphysic perspective. In this concern, Metropolitan Antony gets astray from the tradition and from the patristic measure. He remains on a second plan. The problem does not stay in the simply replacing the «juridical conception» of the satisfaction for the principle of love, more appropriated to God. It must be understood a clarified the place of the salvation work onto the plan of divine economy, like it has been objectively accomplished” (Puti ruskago bogoslovija, Paris, 1937, p. 434). Antony went into his adversity towards the juridical theory so far, so that he left into shadow the importance of the sacrifice on the cross, by putting the accent almost only on the spiritual torment from Gethsemane. “The spiritual torment and the bodily death of Christ, says Antony, were necessary, before all, in order all the believers to appreciate the power of His spiritual sufferance, like being incomparable more powerful than the bodily sufferance” (apud Florovschi w. c.). Our grossly nature cannot understand the spiritual pains. It is impressed much more by the bodily ones. That is why Jesus received the death on the cross. This was done only to impress us. Christ saves us through our obligation to the moral effort. Antony replaces the sacrifice and the divine grace through moral. All his conception is a moralism, though, on the other hand, he speaks about a deep unity of the selves and, so, about a passing of the purifying sufferance of Jesus into each man. He reaches to deny the ancestral sin and to some sort of Pelagianism. The will of the man is not evil but only proud. Through school and through moral effort, and through example – like is the example of Jesus – it can be straightened.

“Prophet David often affirms the speaking of God through the greatness of the nature, but he doesn’t miss also to affirm the speaking of God through diverse troubles or joys He brings into man’s life.” (Stăniloae 2003: 32)

“The world is being created again through a continuous sufferance, which is an uninterrupted killing of its old form, or better said, a continuous forcing over its superficial and obdurate structure, in order to renew it. It is not vainly considered that the baptism is a mysterious death and revival, and the repentance is reckoned as a baptism which must be repeated each time the man falls into sin. The Christian dies on every instant of the world and he resurrects in the communion with Christ. In the same act he does the experience of the former man’s death and of the resurrection like a new man. We are “Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifested in our body.”, said Saint Paul (II Co: 4: 10).” (Stăniloae 1993)

“On Golgotha we have the suffering and atoning humanity. There was not a human individual, who to try to boast himself with what he accomplished through the human nature and to try to confiscate, like being his, the results.

Jesus Christ, both by the fact that His humanity was not that one of an individual, but, somewhat, it was of the entire mankind, but also by the fact that it was not produced by human initiative, but by a divine one – and these two things are in close connection – He is into a special parallel to Adam²³⁸.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Here are two questions to be asked related to the assuming of these passions:

1. Which is, watched closer, their connection with the sinful passions?
2. Which the meaning of their assuming is?

These questions are so closely interweaved, so that is almost impossible to answer them separately.

Regarding the first question, Hans Urs von Balthasar, commenting the ideas of Maximos the Confessor, he says: “These natural passions, though they belong together with the sin, they enrooted so deeply into the being of the nature than they seem to be entered into the nature’s constitution”²³⁹. But this is not a satisfying answer. If these passions belong together with the sin, coming after the sin, the fact that they have become almost an integral part of the constitution of our nature, does it take them out from the organic connection with the sin?

Balthazar himself asks: “Is not the passion, even the irreproachable one, so interweaved with the sin, so that it is done from the passion to the sin a ²³⁸ S. BULGAKOV says: “Christ has received the human nature not like any human has it, namely: limited, shortened, particular-personal, in one word, individual or atomic, but He has received it like the first man had it – Adam -, as came out of the hand of the Lord, namely entire; and such a nature, of «body», it has been given Him, by the Purest Mother”, W. c. p. 231.

²³⁹ W. c. p. 256.

continuous passing?”²⁴⁰.

Saint Maximos the Confessor said about the irreproachable passion that they “characterize our nature”, but the other ones “completely disfigure our nature”. Wherever he spoke about them, he considered them like constitutive elements of our nature, and he quite often called them “punishments”, while the sinful ones he considered them as “against nature”. Saint Maximos the Confessor manifested a remarkable optimism regarding the human nature right after the fall, once he considered these passions, emerged after the sin, like elements which entered the human nature’s constitution without altering it. According to Maximos the Confessor, the human nature is good even having these passions, to that we almost don’t know about which nature the Saint spoke: about the one after the falling, or about the one from before falling. Saint Maximos the Confessor didn’t affirm a necessary connection of theirs, with the sin.

Maximos the Confessor spoke about the nature in itself, like having these irreproachable passions, he concretely looked at Jesus Christ. It is not less true that this way to exist of the human nature in Jesus Christ, without an own hypostasis, had justified Him to speak about our nature regarded in itself, without hypostasis.

Into us, consequently, it is almost impossible not to be manifested a live connection, an internal one, between the two kinds of passions.

The irreproachable passions can remain in this way only at Jesus.

Otherwise, when we are saying that Jesus didn’t assume our sinful passions too, we must explain this also through the fact that the irreproachable passions weren’t soaked, at Him, with the quality of the sin. And, because this is due to the fact that the human nature of Jesus does not have the own human hypostasis, the thesis that the lack of sin of the Savior it results from the divine subject from within Him, it is put into a new light.

Saint Maximos the Confessor clarified the idea that the sinful landscape is received by the human nature through its accomplishing like an own hypostasis, related to the degrees of the will, through which are leaded all the nature’s tendencies. The will, into its ultimate ground, it belongs to the nature. In this first state of it, the will is the general aspiration of the nature to maintains itself into existence, to be, to live, and to move. Thus, the will holds in her hand all the features of the being. As such, the human natural will, it is not only a natural biological aspiration, but also a spiritual one.

In this first stage, the will has not yet specified any object, but it is only the aspiration of being. In the second stage, the will has fixed itself on an object, no matter the possibility the object to be obtained or not. It is for the time being a fanciful will. We would want to be rich, healthy, immortal, without seriously cogitating whether we can achieve these wishes. The will takes into account the final goal, not the means.

In a new stage, the aspiration toward the goal weighs in on the possibility of to reach it, hence on the means. The aspiration stops, therefore, only at the possible goals, and not at the impossible ones - it doesn’t spend any moment cogitating what to eat, bread or stone, but it thinks at what to choose, bread or fruits.

²⁴⁰ W. c. p. 259.

Like a fourth stage there follows the decision or the option or the choosing, between the objects offered by the reflection, like possible and fit to the given case.

To this are comprised, therefore, all the previous phases of the will.

But the option does not automatically come out of deliberation. For many times, it offers us two objects or directions, equally well justified. If we choose one of them and, maybe, even the least based from them, when the judgment does not present them like being equals, this will be due to our internal disposition. This disposition is called by Saint Maximos as γνώμη. This disposition has a subjective character; it is the own opinion, it is the own will, and it is something discretionary.

This own discretionary will, together with the option it caused, like a manifestation of the hypostasis, Saint Maximos the Confessor didn't admit it to Jesus Christ like man. In Him the decision was made by the divine hypostasis, and the own discretionary will of the man it wasn't validated in Him, the human will, being totally subordinated to the godlike one.

In the doctrine of Saint Maximos the Confessor, Γνώμη carries, in general, the character of sin. Both of them, it and also the option originated from it, they owe their possibility to the doubt which the man is in, because of the fact of not being the man fully clear about which of them is better. Where the truth is set apart from any doubt, they are not possible. Therefore, they cannot exist into Jesus Christ. His human will is only a right movement towards the good put in absolute evidence by the presence of the godhead. The evil would come, according to Saint Maximos the Confessor, out of ignorance. When the truth is obvious, the will is not but the launch into a right line of the wish, of the nature according to what is appropriate to it, and this is the good, for what matches to the being like a creature of God it must be good. What Saint Maximos the Confessor said about the inferior character of choosing between two possible objects, it is confirmed by Luis Lavelle when he argues that the complete freedom, unlike the free will, it is own only found at the Divinity, at the pure Act, like they call it²⁴¹.

But this disposition, this opinion, which intervenes like a subjective factor on the table established by the judgment, does it not result out of the depths of the nature? Is it right the idea that the will of the foundation of the nature it is good and only into its hypostatic concretizations does the evil appear? Besides this, do the subterranean movements, unobserved immediately, of the passions and lust, not speak rather about a root of them in the very substrate of the nature?

Without directly answering this question, it is good, maybe, to notice that the hypostatic center of the nature has the decisive role in what concerns the nature's moral state. If the hypostatic center seriously tries to improve the nature, that cannot remain without any good effects. When into the nature there are moving the lusts and the passions, we will always notice a relaxation into the awareness of the hypostatic watch over. The hypostatic center is the one who can sustain or re-enthroned the purity into the nature. And if the hypostatical center is the one who can do this, it will be also responsible when the nature is invaded by evil. The lusts and the passions are moving into the depths of the nature.

²⁴¹ Notre liberté dispose de certaines puissance qu'elle trouve à l'intérieur de nous, de certains objets qu'elle trouve devant nous. Aussi se manifeste-t-elle toujours comme une option: nous ne la reconnaissons que sous la forme du libre arbitre, de telle sorte qu'au sens strict, la liberté c'est-à-dire la parfait indépendance, serait al marque de l'acte pur, au lieu que la libre arbitre serait marque d'un être particulier engagé dans le monde de la pluralité, qui se trouve toujours en présence de différents partis dont l'un deviendra le sien". "Elle nous oblige à composer toujours avec la nécessité". (W. c. p. 193).

The sin stays into the inclination of the man toward the direction opposite to the God's will, manifested through γνώμη. It becomes possible through the rounding of the human nature in the own hypostatic entity. And into an ordinary mode, this is the ordinary condition of its concrete existence. When it could concretely exist once, and not rounded in itself, but under the stage managing of the divine hypostatic center, the possibility towards sin was abolished. The human nature actualizes its movements through its center, which on that time it was not an autonomous center, but a divine one.

One could interpret the idea of the Saint Maximos the Confessor otherwise too. He said that the nature, by not wanting except the things appropriate to itself, it implicitly wants the good, because being the nature from God, it can be only good, like what it fits it. If through the concrete option it can be possible to choose also what is inappropriate to the nature, this will be due to the lack of evidence regarding what is appropriated to the being. But from where it comes this vagueness? It can be answered: from the limitation of our nature. So, the nature wants the general good. But in the nature's concrete existence, a hypostatic one, when the nature must define the objects of its will, and also because of the nature's structure, the nature can choose the evil. The optimism of Saint Maximos the Confessor it would appear to have a pessimistic end.

In any case, also from here it results that the possibility of the sin it begins from on the moment of the hypostatic rounding of the nature, namely on the moment of the concrete existence according to the common law, on the moment which the will - like virtual tension of the nature - it specifies its subject. But the sin is no longer possible in a concrete existence of the nature under the light of the truth, like it exists into the hypostasis of the Logos, or even in people clothed in Christ.

No matter what would the doctrine of Saint Maximos the Confessor be interpreted like, it results that the purity is a good which humanity can have it only when the humanity is overshadowed by the presence of God, but then the human nature necessarily has the purity.

The nature is good by itself, but this is a virtual state and, only through the presence of God, the nature's will does not develop into a γνώμη, producer of sin, namely into arbitrary. The nature actualizes sinless only by according its will to the will of God. Only then it remains in its natural path. That not the simple fact of the hypostatic existence makes the man sinful, it was shown by Saint Maximos the Confessor in other places, where he spoke about a γνώμη brought back into the path of the nature and consolidated in good through the reconciliation with God, accomplished by Jesus Christ²⁴².

So, only for the concretization of the human nature into hypostasis it has taken an opposite character to the nature, and opposite to God, the sin has been produced. The concretization of the Logos into the hypostasis it was unable to produce the sin. Properly-said, into Jesus Christ has existed a human γνώμη, not like an independent reality, but unified with γνώμη of the unique hypostasis.

We understand now why God-the Man has not taken the sinful passions and how, nevertheless, He had a fully human nature.

But how can He have taken then the punishing passions, the irreproachable ones, which have, though, an internal connection with the sin? In which way their belonging to the human nature can be made obvious, unlike the sin?

We are going to try to answer this question in the followings.

The sin, according to Saint Maximos the Confessor, it does not become a reality into the human nature but through the human nature rounding into an own hypostasis, namely only when it is given this personal activation condition, of natural will specification into a qualified will. And, because of the human nature, in natural way, it does not exist but in this autonomist way, a deviated one, the sin appears into the natural order with an absolute regularity.

Though, not on the human nature was grafted the sin, but on its common form of concrete existence into autonomist hypostasis. Who can accomplish it in a concrete way with the detour of its common hypostatic existence, that man shows the human nature without sin. This was the case of Jesus Christ.

The traits of the irreproachable passions are worn by the human nature even in this form, firstly because they were not totally lacking even in the primordial state, though the sin had the power to accentuate or to actualize them. Adam had the need for food and for rest even from before his falling, though not in the same measure like after the falling. The mortality was not like a necessity, but like a possibility in his nature, also before Adam's falling. On the other hand, these weaknesses have an eminently passive character, unlike the sin, which though according to its name like passion, it also breaks the man down to the state of passivity, but though it is done with the active participation of the man, being in a close connection with that γνώμη of which we have spoken, which is an attribute of the hypostatic state. The sin, being thereby indissolubly tied to the hypostatic autonomous character, it differs from the irreproachable passion which the man does not in any way participate to, by his will, being endured exclusively by his nature. These features of the passion suffering are the weaknesses which are produced into nature like a durable echo, but also like a highlighting of some possibilities from it, after the committing of the sin on the basis of the hypostatic condition of the man. The sinful passion too, it also infiltrates into the nature, like a force which passively carries the nature, but it preserves continuously also an active hypostatic side and it cannot be actualized but through the consent of the last one. The sinful passion is what varies from man to man, and what we can diminish until it nearly disappears. The aspects related to the nature, including the irreproachable passions, they cannot be abolished. They remain, no matter how much the man has bettered himself, like unchanged and general elements of the human nature. Jesus Christ has taken the human nature from after the falling, with its weaknesses being there even before the ancestral sin, but He has not taken it also in its hypostatic autonomous way, which constitutes the condition of the sin.

²⁴² "He reconciled us through Himself, with the Father and amongst us, no longer having the opinion opposite to the sense of the nature, but being precisely like through the nature, the same through the opinion, unchangeable". Expositio orationis dominicae, G. P. 90, 880 A – B.

Into the human hypostasis it cannot be made a strict separation between the punishing passions and the sinful ones. To any of our sinful weaknesses it sticks the sin, due to our hypostatic side. The natural hunger quickly transforms itself, for example, into a sinful hunger, associating to itself the lust for a certain aliment, like γνῶμη of the hypostatic state. Jesus Christ can suffer the ordeal of the hunger without associating the hunger to the disordered lust - the autonomous one - for some food, but keeping His ordeal under control through His will which has waited for the decision of the divine-human subject.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“From here one can see that a sufferance with the pure negative meaning of limitation and restraint it’s not enough. There must to be a positive sufferance, a huge one into the body and the soul of the man, without any visible and immediate connection with those passions, but interpreted like a means of atonement and of remaking the own being. We know the effect of the improvement produced upon man by a heavy illness; even if he cannot bring it in an immediate closeness to some sins and to some bad inclinations of his. Many people are deeply influenced by a deadly danger which they have passed through. Everyone can illustrate through similar cases the ennobling power which heavy sufferings have exercised upon him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Where are from, the power and this meaning of a sufferance of which immediate connection with the sin is not visible? If we observe, after the sufferance, a greater improvement of us, the sufferance will must have had a connection with the sin. Inside each of us, there exists an egotistic fund, a sin’s residue, one more or less restraint in its manifestations. The sufferance communicates the power of melting this fund down. Over all, the effort of will we feel it like a larger opening of our subject towards the others’ burdens, like a greater understanding of the fellow humans, like much more sensitiveness intuition to the almightiness of God in report with our shortage. The sufferance shows itself in this way, like being a force which melts the glaciers from around the ego, and which thins the walls of the egotism. The sufferance is the way towards communion; it is the way towards God like a supreme You of us, and towards our fellow human like an equal of us. Whom God sends the sufferance to; He gives him the power which opens the way towards Him. The sufferance, by and large, it is the means of egotism reduction, of opening the moral horizon of the individual; the sufferance makes room for God in front of me, and to other human subjects too. "The sacrifice is the exit from the self, from his isolated selfishness, and it is my opening in front of you", says F. Ebner²⁴³. But this exits from the self it means the recognition of God, the self-limitation of the ego, and the putting of the ego at the disposition of God. And this is the sufferance. Into death it is expressed the bearing of this disposition of the limitation of the self, of obeying to God, to the very end. Where the man does not want to commit this act of entrance, through sufferance and death, into connection with God, he dies by not wanting it, because, without God, the created being cannot live. There the death is a punishment. Where, thereby, the sufferance and the death are accepted like a sacrifice, though they are a consequence of the sin, they escaped the man from sin. But a pure sacrifice and of universal value it cannot be brought by any man." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The stronger and deeper the egotistic fund is pierced into man, the greater is the necessary sufferance for melting it down. On one hand, into this sufferance it must breathe only the regret for the sin. Other liaison mustn't be with the sin. There must be a liaison of pure sufferance. The average man could not exceed the sin through his sufferance, like a sacrifice of his own person, for the reason that his being is so much rotten by sin, so that any sufferance which could be supported by him it cannot be deprived by a sinful element, by an impurity and, through no any other sufferance, even by the mortal agony, he could be able to wash it away. To his nature, there was no any other exist but either to be destroyed or to be stretched eternally into a sinful existence, namely into the hell which is not anything else but the vicious circle made by the mix of the sin and sufferance." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, insisting on the meaning of the forgiveness, we see that even the private individuals amongst themselves, they do not forgive one another without the guilty one manifesting some repentance. In order to forgive a man, that man must feel the need for forgiveness, to see that he has mistaken, and to regret his mistake. You could forgive him before, but the forgiveness would be useless for him, if you do not make him to pass sometime through that spiritual movement of the self-overcoming of the mistake, which consists of remorse, of discontent with his deed, of realizing its gravity and the importance of the transgressed duty or of the unfulfilled one. He does not appreciate the importance of the forgiveness, he does not appropriate it in an intimate way, and he does not truly know it but when he realizes his mistake. The internal experience of the forgiveness he cannot have it before experiencing the gravity of his guilt and of the pain for it. One cannot experience the forgiveness without suffering for his mistake. In the connection of these two spiritual moments are expressed another law of the moral order, which serves to sustaining prestige of the good, of the commandment to do the good.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁴³ "Das wort und die geistigen Realitäten", p. 180. „What sacrifices the man? All he considers into his isolated egoism and into the closing in front of the "you" like his one... The self must surrender everything is his, everything he grasped and wants to grasp when he says: mine, to me, on me. Only then he will live. If, though, he wants of save his live itself, if he wants to affirm his existence through the words: my, to me, on me, no matter how spiritualized is their sense, he will be spiritually lost".

“You won’t be able to elevate the man from the state which sin has thrown him into, if you do not make him pass through a phase of expiatory sufferance, if you do not help him pass through that sufferance²⁴⁴. Right on the moment which you want to forgive him, to call him back in communion with you, you must force him enter the oven of this painful purification. The sufferings, which are the natural consequences of the sin under the first law from the moral-ontological constitution of the spiritual world, through the benevolence of God these sufferings can serve, on the basis of a second law like means for overcoming the sinful state. For this is requested only to be borne voluntarily and interpreted by the one who endures them like welcomed on this purpose. In the first case, the sufferance is only a punishment, in the second one, it is both a punishment and a means of purification. The last sufferance is called expiatory. In the first case, the sufferance is a torment without any exit, a torment which moves endlessly into the vicious circle of the sinful state. In the second case, it is torment stretched towards the light of forgiveness and reconciliation, from which it falls while a ray still lasts on his darkness.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We have looked at the sin and at the punisher or expiatory sufferance, in report with the moral order, like being this connection owed to it. Through this it is highlighted that into the work of people’s salvation through the sacrifice of Jesus, like a substitutive expiatory sufferance, God doesn’t aim a personal satisfaction or a personal revenge, but only the preservation of the moral order. Though, we must not imagine a separation between the moral order and the personal existence of God. If that had been the case, God would have appeared like a servant of a law.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“When God sees that we have entered the phase of the voluntarily sufferance, which has an expiatory character, He has a joy, because He knows that this sufferance brings us towards Him. Instead, about the sufferance under which we groan revolted, by multiplying our sin, He has not any joy. Of our expiatory sufferance He has a satisfaction, not an egotistic one, but a satisfaction of the parent who sees his son under the endeavor about he knows that it will bring his son on the right path. Because God knows that the absence of these sufferings for a long time, eventually even for the whole earthly life, it will make the man incapable of being saved, so that He also has a positive role in bringing these sufferings.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁴⁴ The Catholic theologian Karl Adam writes: “The love of God it pervades towards the essential from within people and from things, towards the preservation, the ensuring, and the restoration of those original references and relations, which reign between Creator and creature, and from which it springs out the fullness of the life and of the power, and the joy, and the happiness. It is a saint love, one full of values, and one even creator of values. And where it meets the shortcoming and the sin, into the fallen man, where it reveals like a merciful love, a forgiving one, it is not an empty forgiveness, a simple passing overlooking and an ignoring of our guilt, but it is always a creative forgiveness too, namely a forgiveness which abolishes the infinite non- value, the conscious denial of the God’s fundamental value, and the apostate idolatry of a created thing”. (Jesus Christus, p. 321). The Anglican theologian R. C. Moberly says: “We know that if a man has committed sin, it won’t be enough, even though possible, to become again good and obedient. It must be done something in the direction of the abolishment of the past, without which the obedience would not be, in the true sense, really possible and which, of course, it cannot be express only into the terms of the present obedience” (Atonement and Personality, London, 1932, p. 116).

“We have said that the expiatory sufferance is the voluntarily endured punishment, without any spirit of reproach against God, like a consummated homage brought to Him; namely, the sufferance endured in full cleanliness. It is the clean sacrifice (Heb. 9: 14), the only one which God wants. The people, though, they couldn’t bring themselves such a clean sacrifice. Each of their sufferance was carrying the seal of the sin from within their beings, increasing it. The sufferance to death, including the death, it was a satisfying-suffering²⁴⁵, not by being a satisfaction, but by being a punishment prolonged into eternity, and not a redemptive one²⁴⁶.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The sufferance of the one for another it is shown for many times by the reports amongst people, and these reports also indicate the possibility of a assuming the sin of the fellow human together with the sufferance for him. A mother suffers for the villainous deeds of her son, like she would have done those deeds and she is capable of receiving any punishment on her son’s behalf. The bigger the loving closeness between two people it, the bigger is the capacity of assuming the sin of for one another²⁴⁷. Jesus, by

²⁴⁵ Academician PhD. Priest Professor Dumitru Stăniloae was a rhetoric genius, who created new words all the time. In this case he put together the word satisfaction with the word suffering, in order to express his idea in the best possible way. (E. I. t.’s n.)

²⁴⁶ The Anglican theologian R. C. Moberly, in his famous book entitled “Atonement and Personality”, he writes: “The idea of effective expiation for the sin it equally asks for a perfect repentance and for a perfect power of sanctification. The man has sinned. The man is no more righteous. If I am unrighteous, what will be able to make me to be absolutely righteous? If my repentance – referring to the past – have been truly perfect, this would have meant that my person would have been still absolutely one with the Justice in the condemnation of the sin into me and on my account. Such a re-identification to the justice, if it has been possible, it would have been a real contradiction with my past... In report with the past, with the present, and with the future, I would have had to become perfect and continuous and godlike by right” (P. 110). Into the man, though, there cannot be found these two contradictory states: the repentance for the sin and the purity. Only in Jesus they interweaved, for He was both Judge of the sin and God, like the One Who never has sinned, but He was also an Expiator of the sin, like a man who has taken the sin upon Himself, by self-condemning Himself. He condemned the sin, but He made Himself as sin. “He, the eternal Justice, by judging the sin, He judged it not into another person, but He judged like a penitent is judged, in Himself; He brought Himself in front of the judgment which He pronounced; He stays in the role not of a simple judge, nor of a simple victim, but of a voluntary penitent, identified to the justice of God in His own sacrifice” (p. 110).

²⁴⁷ R. C. MOBERLY, Atonement and Personality, p. 118: “The law of the sufferance or of the substitutive energy, like a principle which circulates all over in the human life, it is not suspended when we step into the region of the conscience of the sin. Others suffer and are sad in fact in favor of their convicted fellows and not only with them, but deeper and sharper than they can do it. Not only is the sufferance in their life, but also there is the shame in their heart, proportionally, maybe, with the shameless of those ones and with their love. There is even more. This shame, as product of their closeness and love, it is the most powerful element of our hope for the ones who have sinned. If they are beings close to us and dear to us, who with the immaculate purity of their heart and with their confident love, they tirelessly place themselves under the burden of the taking upon Him the human sin, He shows that He has come in the maximum closeness to the people; He has come closer than the best brother, or than the most loving mother. In order to make Himself our Hierarchal towards God, it was insufficient a juridical assumption of the form of man, but He had to come close to us in the supreme intimacy. The prophet, like the one who comes in the closeness of the second person and who speaks to us directly out of love, and the hierarchal, right the one who, from the same love, he suffers for our sins even to death, they complete each other also under this report, the first one searching the fulfillment into the last one, and this one supposing the first one.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The sufferance of Jesus in Gethsemane Garden equaled the sufferance which should have been felt by all the people for their sin, because He was hurt like weren’t hurt all of them for being forsaken by the Father, which, like bearer of sin, He experienced it in those hours. Keeping the sin upon Himself, there came a moment in which to know, not like a divine subject, but like a human subject or, better said, not like a subject, but like an object, the profound displeasure of God for the sin. Two are the reasons why Jesus suffered a greater pain than of all the people together. Firstly, because His hypostasis has as characteristic, the eternal communion with the Father. How dreadful should have been to Him to endure, be it through the human nature, the darkening of this communion?” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The most tormenting spiritual sufferance stays, though, in the last analyze, into the isolation sentiment, of being forsaken by everybody. The man thickened into sin, he doesn’t feel his abandoning by God so painfully, either the lack of the true communion with the fellow humans. He is pleased with the surrogate of a shallow relation with these ones. But when the human being doesn’t have even these things, though, despite the whole his spiritual insensitiveness, he is invaded by an overwhelming sufferance.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God gives the punishment in order to bring the sinner towards penitence. As the penitence state has become more perfect, the punishment loses its external character, by becoming a self-tormenting. “All that is punishment until the penitence was produced, in the perfect contribution, it is part of the voluntarily condemnation of the sin, offered by the penitent with the whole his heart”.

“In this way, in the great and mysterious sacrifice of the Calvary, it is not about a real revenge imposed by another, from outside. It is not an external equalization with the punishment... (p. 131). Here is not any element of hitting, on one hand, or of enduring the revenge, on the other shame of the ones who have sin, thanks goodness, I will sense that, into the atmosphere of this substitutive penitence which shrouds the ones who have sinned and sneak, almost imperceptibly, like respiration of their love in their life and in their soul, that there is something which makes you daring and to warrant the certitude of their future salvation”.

hand. This death under the power of the physical and spiritual torments, it is the spontaneous voluntary action of the inherent justice, the brightness and the triumph of the inherent justice in the conditions which the justice can triumph in this case”.

“He must not endure the human revenge”. We feel that this is something too much “shocking and blasphemous for thinking”. But, more than that, this means a “negation of the divine character of the eternal Father and of the divine being of the embodied Son”. This “contradicts the whole conception about salvation”. “God’s revenge is the final consumption for the unrepentant, unsaved, unforgotten, and unforgivable sin (p. 132).

“He must not endure the condemnation of the sin. But, in the bitter humiliation of a conscience self-adapted to what the real sin is – and so, the condemnation of the sin – He bowed down His head under everything the sufferance could mean, to where the experience of the death leads, this sufferance being the counterweight to the condemnation, like an extreme possibility of denial and destruction of the self”. This death, by killing everything that was mortal into Him, it also killed the sin (p. 133).

Besides what we said introducing this note, it can be done, on the Moberly’s theory, the following observation: the Moberly’s explanation seems to keep God into a passivity towards the saving work of Jesus Christ. The sacrifice of Jesus stood in report with the moral law, because the man could not be escaped from sin without a sufferance which to be so clean and so big so that to evaporate the sin, without a sufferance which to end in death. And the moral law is the expression of God’s will. The justice, which condemned the sin through the sufferance of Jesus, even if it was also into Jesus like a man, it was there only because this Man conformed Himself to the divine will. And the divine will, it was represented not only by Jesus like God, but also by the Father and by the Holy Ghost.

God Himself cannot be considered in a role of a penitent in the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. And like judge of the sin cannot be considered only God-the Son, but God in all Three Hypostases. This thing emerges enough clearly from Moberly’s theory, which, on one hand, it does not sufficiently highlight that Jesus suffered like man, and not like God, and, on the other hand, it highlights, rightly, the interweaved presence and work of the Father and of the Holy Ghost into the Son, though not for the condemnation of the sin, but for a substitutive penitence.

Jesus fulfilled the role of the penitent like man, but then in front of God. And the penitence means, actually, the enduring of the rough effects of the moral law consequently to the sin. When these effects can be endured into goodness and fullness, the subject is saved. When this isn’t possible, they are prolonged forever, as long as the sin prolongs itself. If the forgiveness of the people cannot be obtained from the Father without death, that means God ordered death for sin. Though, we cannot cogitate that He orders out of a caprice, but on the basis of a permanent order, namely the divine justice.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The punishment is a reaction against the egocentric hypertrophy

manifested through the sin. It is a forced limitation from outside it. That is why, it is interweaved with pain. Under its blow, it manifests the fear of a damaging, of a shrinking, of a disappearance, eventually. But the punishment for the sin it must be, in fact, a total annulling of the sinner from the known way of life, into which the sin was committed.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We have mentioned the sufferance of the individuals without sin, because of their nonconformity with the world. We must notice that this sufferance is not to them a torment, but, in the same time, it is happiness. It is a transfiguration hidden into humbleness and sufferance, but it still is a real transfiguration. And, for the power from within them it is conveyed also to the Cosmos and to many beings from around them, which honor them like their powerful but mysterious helmsmen, one can say that, through the unseen action of the Holy Ghost, there exists a continuous state and there is produced a continuous work of transfiguration of the word in a hidden way, despite of the proud reign of the laws of the sin from the surface. And, even more, these categories of the sin they haven’t a full reign either to the surface. Through them sprout out and are mixed the powers of the transfiguring order from hidden. Without this counterbalancing the relative order from the surface couldn’t have been maintained, but it would have become a chaos.

The form of this world, though generally, it is not compatible with the happy life of the ones without sin, though it mustn’t be considered unilaterally like being universally evil – in Protestant sense – or like being universally good, which – by making a responsible life useless, and by deepening the whole life into indifference – it reminds again either about the Protestant thesis or about the naturalistic thesis.

The hidden transfiguration of the world remains so, generally, not full, not satisfying. Absolute reign over this world cannot win. Something like that would mean the end of this world.

This is the reason why the resurrection of the bodies cannot take place before the end of this world.

This thing is shown to us by the resurrection of Christ, which is also to Him a new ascent like man. His resurrection is the full victory over death and not only a proof to the people from earth that death doesn’t mean the total end of the being. This victory is the anticipation of such a victory also to us, because, even the souls of the righteous enjoy a happiness after the separation from the body, like Jesus enjoyed too, their state of separation still presents a blunt, an incompleteness of the man through death, after the hereditary sin. The happiness, at which some souls go after death, it wouldn’t have been possible if they hadn’t been destined to resurrection, if that state hadn’t been an anticipation of the resurrection, like it was also to Jesus His descent into brightness, in the region of the souls from after death.

Sergei Bulgakov, by noticing the tape measure on which is lined up: the descent into hell, the resurrection, and the ascent to heaven, he draws the conclusion that these acts are part of the hierarchal service of God or, in any case, they still not are parts of His royal dignity, because in His situation of emperor like man - says Bulgakov - Jesus is not but only since the moment on which He sits on the chair of glory, on the Father's right hand. The most important Biblical argument for its affirmation Bulgakov finds it in the Epistle towards Hebrews, where it is said that Jesus entered with his own blood in the Holy of the Holies (9: 12). So, until He didn't ascent again to the Father, Jesus would not finish His hierarchal service.

This thesis grows up from the ensemble of the conception of Sergei Bulgakov about the work of Jesus Who would not have been saved the people by the bringing of the sacrifice like a fulfillment of an order of the divine justice, but by inwardly transformation of His human nature and, after that, through the irradiation of His power outwardly, into all the people. But this conception seems to us to be wrong when sustains – and so exclusively – a gradual perfecting of the human nature in Jesus. It could result from here that, at the beginning, this nature has had moral shortcomings.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Symbol

“The secondary argument brought by the icons’ defenders against the mosaic interdiction of carving images of God, invoked by iconoclasts, it was a precious specification of the difference between idol and symbol. Through it, the icons’ defenders showed that even the Old Testament, despite forbidding the carved images, it didn’t forbid the so-called symbols, which constituted an anticipation for icons. So, they clearly differentiated between idol and symbol, unlike their adversaries.” (Stăniloae 2005: 85)

“It is possible that the icons’ defenders did for the first time in the history of thinking, this specification, in a conscious manner. Through it could be reconciled in the Christian conscience the apparent contradiction between the Old Testament forbidding the carved images and the commandments of casting two cherubs in the Holy Tent (Exodus 21: 18-21), or of casting a brass snake as sign of Christ (Numbers 25: 8-9). Unlike the iconoclasts who solved this difficulty in a simplistic manner, by disregarding the commandment concerning the Cherubs, the brass snake, and other resemblant commandments, on the reason that God cannot contradict Himself, Saint Theodore the Studite said: “O, what insanity! The negation forbids us to liken God to any existing creature, to the sun, to the moon, to the stars, or to something from the other things, as it means building idols; the affirmation wants to elevate Israel, as much as possible, on a symbolic path, through certain images and shapes, to the contemplation of and to the union with God. Isn’t the whole image of the Tent a seen manifestation of the serving into ghost, designated through symbolic visions, to the great Moses, by everybody’s God?”. The differentiation made here between idol and symbol it is clear. Whilst the idol sticks the spirit of the worshipper to the created world, the symbol serves to elevate the human mind beyond, to spiritually contemplate and worship God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 86)

“The symbol, by and large, it is an indicator towards what is beyond the symbol. The symbol isn’t a reality for itself, but it depends on another reality which it symbolizes. It is a finger pointing towards something else, which isn’t seen, but which the human spirit is helped by symbol to think at. The symbol can have also the character of a self-standing reality, having a purpose in the order of the natural life. But besides this natural purpose, the respective reality can also receive the function of symbol, which is different from that had on the basis of its self-standing existence, and which serves as indicator towards another reality. For instance, a lit candle, besides its natural purpose of being a candle, it also has the function as symbol, which it is no longer considered as a thing in itself through, but it is regarded in connection with the spiritual light imagined by that candle. Either is a thing in the order of the nature and of the natural needs, or it is a thing specifically made for having the purpose of symbol – and not having any other purpose –, anything, through its function of symbol, it is an image of a reality differing from it, and not as something self-standing. The symbol is a ladder helping the spirit to ascend to the symbolized reality. The character as image and as means of ascension of the mind beyond the symbol, these are, actually, one and the same feature the symbol has.” (Stăniloae 2005: 86-87)

“According to a general determination regarding any symbol by and large, namely anything serving to direct the mind towards another reality, the idol too, it can be considered as symbol. But in this general sphere of the concept of symbol, it is distinguished a special symbol, which is characteristic to the cogitation and to the feeling both Mosaic and Christian. The reality indicated through this special symbol, it isn’t a reality from this world, but it is a transcendent reality. The correlation with the transcendence it is the distinctive note of the Mosaic and Christian symbol. The symbol, in this special meaning, it awakens and it upholds the relating of the human spirit to transcendence. The symbol is seen depending on transcendence. Through the symbol one “contemplates” the transcendence and one “serves” the transcendence. That something which the religious Mosaic and Christians indicate to, it is the transcendence.” (Stăniloae 2005: 87)

“The character as symbol of this world it can be discovered increasingly further, and this “symbolizing” of the world is a man’s mission. The same this is said by K. Jaspers. “The whole empirical reality (Dasein) it is crossed through by a potential symbolism”. He also brings some valuable clarifications in this various domain of the symbols. He distinguishes a symbolism of the significations and a symbolism of the contemplation. The difference between these two it isn’t totally identical to the difference between the things of the created world and transcendence. This is for the symbolism of the significations can express not only the reports amongst the things from within world, but it can also express reports between things and transcendence. The difference ascertained by Jaspers it rather refers to two attitudes, or to two soul’s state. The symbol which it deals with, it is called by Jaspers as cypher. The symbolism of the significations comes out of an intellectual comparison between things, and therefore it separated the signified from sign and, given the connections amongst all the elements of the empirical reality, anything can be signified through everything. But in cypher one contemplates only the transcendence and without separating it from sign. One can live also his cogitation about God as a cypher, but then he penetrates through cogitation to the foundation or in the abyss of his cogitation, beyond any cogitation. And, of course, even the living of the transcendence through sypher it cannot avoid a signification. But in this signification isn’t indicated something through something else, but it is expressed the lived transcendence together with the cypher. Through it, the feeling becomes clearer and deeper. This is because the cypher and its signifying do not occasion a finished living of the transcendence, but an always deeper sign of it.” (Stăniloae 2005: 97-98)

“The idol doesn’t pose difficult problems in the undertaking of knowing the forces expressed by idol. The idolater knows adequately, though not in the whole extension, the “forces” of his deities. But the knowledge occasioned by symbol is antinomic. It is a knowledge in nescience, or a nescience in knowledge. These differences are shown also in the mode of building the idols and the symbols. The idol too, it presents the stylized nature, but by exaggerating the limbs which the nature’s forces he wants to express are manifested through. It is an exaggeration which doesn’t elevate the man upon nature, but it highlights him some of the nature’s forces, by breaking the natural equilibrium in the favor of those forces. In symbol, as transcendence’s cypher, without being annulled the natural forces, for these forces serve as images for other spiritual forces, there are chosen the good forces and they are presented in an association with elements opposing the evil forces, in order to raise the man’s look, at forces superior to the nature’s force, namely to forces of spiritual order. The brass snake is hanged on the cross in order to show that what is evil, it is defeated; the Aaron’s staff flourishes in order to defeat the corruption; The Cherubs are presented as winged people etc. Or, if not, are taken as symbols the cleanest things, in order to make possible to be symbolized the clean and luminous features of the transcendence (clean wheat flour, oil, wine etc.). So, the accent is placed on the beautiful, noble features of the things, and their defects are overshadowed. Of course, in order to a certain thing to become a religious symbol, or symbol of the divine transcendence in a restricted sense, it is necessary that the believers to be utterly convinced that God Himself has chosen that thing as His symbol, that God has highlighted certain features of the that thing which can mirror the divine features, in order the light of being chosen by God to stay upon that thing, a fact that makes of that thing more than any natural feature of it, an environment which the divine transcendence is contemplated through.” (Stăniloae 2005: 99-100)

“The fact that the things will serve as religious symbols in restricted sense, only if they are chosen and sanctified by God, and not simply due to their good features, it shows, in the same time, the antinomic gnoseological character of the symbols. The only clear thing the symbols make it known to us it is the existence of God and His relation with the things and through thing with us. Through things the human spirit achieves, by and large, a transcending from the created things to the uncreated God. There isn’t anything else that we know through, so clearly about God. That’s why the Holy Fathers said that through creatures we know that there is God, but we do not know what God is. The things, and above all: the whole world, they are necessary to us in order us to know G0od, but they do not offer us an adequate knowledge about God. If we didn’t take the world in consideration as symbol, we would have only a negative knowledge and feeling about God, as Creator and almighty upholder of everybody. And by consistently developing this iconoclast thesis, it leads to denying any knowledge about God, and this is for the negative of the apophatic knowledge it means experiencing God, through man, while the iconoclasts refuse to God any relation with His Creation. But the world's symbols do not offer us, on the other hand, the possibility of adequately know how the divinity is in relation with the world and especially beyond the world, for God – in His work as Creator and Source of the Providence and beyond it – He is unseen and, He is above anything He created and which He takes care of.” (Stăniloae 2005: 100-101)

“One can say, therefore, that the seen form, without being identical to the unseen form, it is unseparated from that one, it is soaked with that one. Immediately the unseen form no longer had been in the seen form, the seen form of the things would have decomposed. The seen thing is symbols of his unseen paradigm, just by the fact that these two ones, without being one, they still are together, they are unseparated. Of this consists the antinomy of the symbol, that in order to know what isn't seen, you must look at what is seen, but in the same time you must surpass what is seen. What is seen it makes you known what isn't seen, but you still mustn't stop yourself to what is seen, because this means transforming that seen one in an idol. But the transcendence doesn't forsake the seen thing, for the prototype that can be intuited in the seen thing, it works within the seen thing, but without being one with the seen things. What isn't seen, it is and it isn't known through what is seen; it is and it isn't defined by what is seen.” (Stăniloae 2005: 112)

“The things as symbols, they do not indicate the divine rationalities only like causes which created the things once, and which are now separated from things, and inactive. They indicate the divine rationalities not only as the ones which God created them through, but also as the ones which God keeps them in His Providence through. Between Creation and Providence there is a tight connection. The things aren't only the symbols of God-the Creator, but they are also the symbols of God-the Providence Giver. The things indicate a work of God, a work active on any moment within things.” (Stăniloae 2005: 112)

“The icons' defenders said that before Christ, the people tended to make idols out of the seen things. The sin deprived the people of the power of being able to look beyond things, at the divine paradigms. That's why God forbade to the people to make carved images. But God recommended the people, though, some images, but with the aprioristic commandment not to reckon them as God, but only as the symbols of God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 113)

“The clean behavior of the people amongst things, as also the godlike grace poured upon the people, they make the people to more easily see in things the things’ godlike prototypes. The advancing on this way of seeing the people and the things, as symbols, it equals, therefore, to a gradual sanctification of theirs through grace. The full unveiling, the full lighting of the godlike prototypes through people and things, it will take place, though, only in the future life, when all the stains from the life of the righteous will have been be erased, and when the creation will have been liberated from the slavery of the corruption, which it has been submitted to, because of the man (Rom. 8: 21).” (Stăniloae 2005: 114)

“The icons’ defenders showed that the non-embodied God cannot be represented in an icon, but He can only be cogitated in symbols; but this is not valid for the Embodied God too. The symbols cannot be prototypes to icons because of two reasons:

a) The symbol is a created thing and that’s all; the symbol doesn’t present God, but it is the result of a work of God, and that’s why it is not important that the symbol’s image to be multiplied, because of not being - the symbol’s image – the God’s image.

b) Anything, from anywhere, it is too, a symbol of God, so that it isn’t necessary to be reproduced the image of a thing from distance. Though, if God prescribes through Revelation a certain thing as symbol of one of His works, for instance the lamb, these one it can be found everywhere, or even if certain objects only for they are sanctified and placed on a certain place (in the Temple of the Law), similar objects can be seen everywhere, and the holiness of the ones from within Temple it cannot be represented in icons.” (Stăniloae 2005: 119)

“The icon’s defenders, by distinguishing, by and large, the icon from the symbol, by considering the icon as an expression of a great closeness of God to the world, by considering the icon the expression of a great unveiling of God through embodiment, by founding the icon on the human nature as image of God, and especially on the fact that in Christ this nature is a maximum image of the Godhead, in the meaning of a full union with God-the Word, these icon’s defenders could give the iconoclasts the impression that they, unlike the Old Testament, they came again close to the idea of confounding the icon to God, as in the case of the pagan idol. That’s why the objection of the iconoclasts was beneficial for it gave the Orthodox the occasion to specify that they understood through icon something else than the iconoclasts did, so that all the reproached made by iconoclasts were inconsistent, for those reproaches were based on a conception about icon that wasn’t characteristic to the iconodules, but only to the iconoclasts. In other words, the icons’ defenders specified that to then, the icon, though it is more than the symbol, it still remains framed in the symbol’s genre.” (Stăniloae 2005: 122-123)

“Regarding the idea of symbol, we have to make some distinctions. There is a symbol belonging to the nature of the symbolized thing, and there is also a symbol of another nature. For instance, the dawns are the natural symbol of the sun, for there are from the sunlight. The symbol of another nature can be also diverse: a thing that subsists by itself, or one that is only an illusion, a phantasm, or an apparition without reality. Belonging to the first category is the lion as symbol of a strong man; in the second category falls some forms shown to the prophets, for instance the sickle seen by Zachariah and other likewise. The natural symbol is always with and into the nature which the symbol has its existence from. The symbol of another nature and subsisting by itself, it cannot be always with the things it symbolized, but it can exist also before and after the moment which it is considered as symbol on. Finally, a symbol without a real existence, produced by Providence only in order to exemplify a certain thing, it doesn’t exist except only on the moment which it serves as symbol on; it doesn’t exist either before or after, and immediately perishes definitively.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 67)

Tears / Crying

“The most subtle analyses of the crying and of all its varieties, we have been offered by John Climacus in the 7th level of his Ladder. We give here a few modes which he characterizes the tears in. By and large, he says: “As the fire consumes the reed, likewise the tear cleans up any seen or spiritual stain”. According to Saint John Climacus there are several types of tears: “from nature, from God, and from enemy; or of praising, due to our vain glory, out of causes of fornication, of love, out of remembering the death and out of many other reasons”. We, by shaking off all the things by the fear of God, let’s gain the clean and not-cunning tears by thinking at death, for there isn’t in them any deceit or self-appreciation, but they rather bring the cleaning and the thriving in the love of God, the washing away of sins, and the setting free from passions. There is no wonder the crying to start with good tears and to end with evil tears. But it is worthy to be praised that crying starting from the contrary of from the natural things, and to reach the spiritual things. That’s why do not trust the springs of your tears before the consummate cleaning. This is for one mustn’t trust the wine immediately after pouring the juice from grapes press in the barrel”. “The one travelling with relentless crying towards God, he doesn’t stop being on every day in holyday, as the one who is in continuous celebration with his body, he will receive the relentless crying”. (Stăniloae 1992: 115-116)

“The tears banish away the laughter. “Be like a man in your heart, sitting on the high throne of your humbleness and commanding to the laughter: “Go away” and it goes away, and commanding to the sweet crying: “Come to me” and it comes, and to our servant, the tyrannical body: “Do this” and it does it. If somebody has dressed himself up in tears as in a happy and full of grace wedding garment, he has known the spiritual laughter of the soul”. The crying on the superior levels it is no longer a crying of the bodily eyes. “Abolish the sin and it becomes useless the pained tear of the sensitive eyes. In Adam there was no tear before his falling, as there won’t be after resurrection either, since the sin will be abolished.” (Stăniloae 1992: 116)

“Most of the time, the ones who pray remain within their bodies and the feel the passions from within themselves. The holy things produced by prayer, they elevate and they spiritualize the natural things, but they do not abolish them. The beginning of this consummation it is the fear, which doesn’t kill the passionate part of the soul (as Barlaam thought) but, by becoming a work pleasant to God, it produced the pricking of the heart and the savior crying, namely the bath of the forgiveness. The cleaning tears which give the prayer wings, and which lighten the spirit’s eyes, and which maintain, as Gregory Sinaites says, the grace of the Baptism, and if the grace gest far these tears call the grace back, and this is the reason why these tears are also called as the second Baptism; aren’t these tears a work common to the body and to the passionate part of the soul?” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 50)

Temptation /
Trial / Test

“The Romanian language is more nuances regarding the man’s testing and it reserves to the two sorts of tests different words: through temptation it indicates almost exclusively the test through pleasure, reserving to the test through pain the word trial. Thus, when we hear about temptation, we think at something attractive, and when we hear about trial, we think at something difficult to endure.” (Stăniloae 1992: 137)

“In Christendom, the test doesn’t have only a scientific purpose of making the man to reveal himself. The test isn’t a simple objective experiment, but it has mainly a pedagogical purpose. Through it, the man must not only to know himself, but especially to correct himself, namely: by knowing himself to correct himself. The test doesn’t aim so much to reveal the intensity a man’s lusts and angry, but it has rather the purpose of making the man to overcome his lusts and angry. Of course, as you cannot tell that you have defeated somebody while you have tied him while he was sleeping, likewise one cannot speak about a victory upon lust except he defeats that lust in the moment the lust it has all the conditions to actually manifest its power. If you dominate a passion until nothing stirs it up from its sleep, it doesn’t mean you have weakened it neither that you have quenched it. You will be able to say that you have quenched the passion’s power only if you, when putting in front of the passion the test that stirs it up, that your passions no longer are stirred up or, even if that passion is stirred up you still can appease it. That’s why the tests have, on one hand, the purpose of unveiling what phase you have reached at, in your endeavor of defeating your passions, or what intensity your passions are in, and on the other hand, the tests have the purpose of making the struggle against your passions to become even stronger.” (Stăniloae 1992: 137)

“In a restricted meaning, the temptations have the purpose of making us to defeat the lust’s passions, or to defeat the attraction exercised upon lust by the perspective of the pleasures, like the trials have the purpose of making us to defeat the passions of the anger, or the repulsion and the reaction which the pain awakens to us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 137)

“The temptations help us to grow up spiritually by rejecting them, namely through restraint, as the trials fulfill their purpose of strengthening us by accepting them. One can see that the restraint is an easier thing to do, for we can assume the toils of the restraint by our own initiative. Properly-said, one mustn’t always wait for the apparition of the external temptation, in order to make the effort of a restraint. This is because of each man bearing in himself the lust, as a torsion spring stretching from time to time towards pleasures, on the basis of the man’s memories, of the habit, or of a natural appetite searching for an exaggerated satisfying. Maybe this is the main reason why the man can proceed to a systematic life of restrains out of his own initiative, through willing toils.” (Stăniloae 1992: 137-138)

“In the case of sadness, anger, and rebellion, on one hand, the restraining from them is more difficult, and on the other hand, they are only servants to the pleasure’s passions. That’s why fighting them must follow in a more advanced stage of the spiritual life, being eased by the weakening of the basis passions of the lust. But, besides that, they are almost always stirred up by external causes. The rebellion doesn’t have its ultimate source within us, for we do not rebel for the sake of rebellion itself. The rebellion is always a reaction and not a primordial initiative, as the lust’s movement is. That’s why one must wait for the external causes in order to fight the passions stirred up by them. Then, while the temptation invites us to pleasure, and the trials bring us pain, it is easier to renounce to pleasure than to search for pain.” (Stăniloae 1992: 138)

“Actually, we aren’t asked for searching for pain out of our initiative, but we are asked to take measures out of our initiative in order to reject or to preempt the pleasure. The primordial and direct cause for the man’s falling isn’t the running away from pain, but it is the searching for pleasure. The running away from pain it comes later on, because the pain has been brought by pleasure. Therefore, one must fight the pleasure in the first place, mainly and directly. As the pleasure is often searched, out of an our previous initiative, and the pain is almost always avoided through a reaction taking place when the pain is caused, likewise, if we want to escape the initial initiative searching for pleasure we will have to do it also through a previous contrary initiative, while if we want to escape the reaction contrary to pain caused on the moment the pain appears, we must wait for that moment in order to stop that reaction. It is true that I can prepare myself in advance for receiving a pain that follows to be caused to me. But I do not cause to myself the pain, in advance, or I do not quicken the pain’s apparition, but I wait for it to be caused to me. Also, out of own initiative I must reach the state of no longer manifesting such an initiative, that of no longer searching for pleasure. I run away from pleasure as reaction to a fact that I expect. But I must wait for the moment of the pain in order to stop my repulsive reaction to it.” (Stăniloae 1992: 138)

“The Savior passed the two kinds of tests, in the same order: first, the temptation through pleasure in the wilderness, and second, the supreme trials through pain during His sufferings and death on the cross. Both accepting the pleasure and rejecting the pain the weakness of the nature is being manifested in. This is for the passions receiving and manifesting the pleasure and those ones rejecting the pain, they aren’t else but the manifestations of the nature’s weakness. Jesus strengthened His human nature, and through that He strengthened the human nature by and large, both by rejecting the pleasure and by accepting the pain.” (Stăniloae 1992: 139)

“Actually, in searching for pleasure and in running away from pain there is manifested a nature’s weakness, which, on psychic plan, it is experienced in the first case as a difficult to be stopped impulse and, in the second case, adds a fear difficult to dominate, and this fear (fear for the life into body) it fuels the worry. Sometimes the fear of pain is manifested so dreadfully so that we can consider it as the supreme trait of passiveness in front of the tyranny contravening our nature’s freedom and self-control.” (Stăniloae 1992: 139)

Tent

“That’s why it is said in Exodus that Moses, by entering the divine darkness, he saw the archetype of the divine tent. Saint Gregory of Nyssa affirmed for several times that whosoever enters the godlike light he has the experience of entering the not-made-by-human-hand tent of the godhead, Who is the eternal Son of the Father, the wisdom and the power of God. Just this Holy Father who forbade the man to liken God to some concept of the known things, or to some imagining of the human fantasia, he said that after Moses purified his life, he “entered the not-made-by-human-hand tent”, seemingly wanting to indicate that this structure seen by Moses it hasn’t a unilaterally theoretical character, but it is an existential living of the divine intimacy by the whole man, by being an experience and not a theoretical knowledge, a structure of the love and not a concept. This ascension of the man doesn’t mean only a progress in God but in the man himself too, the man becoming ever higher than himself. Like Saint Gregory Palamas, Saint Gregory of Nyssa highlighted that entering the not-made-by-human-hand temple it isn’t simply apophatism, but it is a positive seeing and a living in a reality superior to any knowledge.” (Stăniloae 1992: 298-299)

“Under the general shape of a tent, which comprise everything that exist, as Saint Gregory of Nyssa said, the Apostle Paul saw at his turn the heavenly mysteries which is not forgiven to the man to utter. In this tent we will be fully shelter in the future life, when our seen tent will be undone – namely this body – and we will be dressed up in the not-made-by-human-hand-house form heavens, namely in Christ. This is “the larger and the most consummate tent, not-made-by-human-hand, namely not belonging to this creation”, in which Holy of the Holies entered Christ only for once, namely it is the godhead which Christ entered fully entered as man, as our Fore-Runner. It is the One begotten Word of God “in Whom have been built up all the seen and the unseen things, either thrones, or chieftains, or masteries, of dominions, or power” (Col. 1:16).” (Stăniloae 1992: 299-300)

“The heavenly tent which we will be dressed up in, in the future life, it cannot be except the hypostatic and all-comprising and also all-loving, Wisdom of God, for Apostle Paul called the body That One took as His “iconostasis”, which we will enter the infinity of His godhead through. Saint Gregory of Nyssa reckons, by and large, the body as “iconostasis of the tent from below”. So, our soul would be the lower tent, made in the image of the tent from above, for – in the likeness of the Logos into Whom are comprised from ever all the things’ rationalities and at the end so will be all the creatures – it is destined at its turn to embrace with love the rationalities and the images of everybody, but not as their existential source, but as receiver. But in another place, Saint Apostle Paul called the body itself as “tent”, which would want not to be separated from but we would want to put the other body on, over this one, “for what it is mortal to be swallowed up by life” (II Cor. 5: 4). This is because nothing from our being, and therefore neither the body, it will be lost, but it will be overwhelmed by light and it is shown as light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 300)

“Either through the “tent from below” it is understood only the body, or the only soul, or it is understood the whole man composed of soul and body – and this is more probable –, the fact is that like our tent from below will once put on the tent from above, likewise the tent from above has put on the tent from below, being shown by this a conformity between the two tents. The purpose on which the tent from above accepted to put on a tent from below it was His will of restoring and consolidating this tent from below which entered the process of collapsing. Better said, by these there haven’t been combined two tents, but one and the same uncreated and eternal tent has made Himself as created too, for Christ is a sole tent, created and uncreated, in His quality as unique divine-human Person. To the same purpose of consolidation and restoration and full achievement in an eternal existence of the tent from below, it serves also the putting on of the tent from above, by entering the light, in the life from here for short periods of time, and forever and fully in the future life. Properly-said, by entering us the light it is being consummated the work started through creation, a fact that starts with the descending of the “Light” within world, where the Light lightens as in a darkness that hasn’t comprised it yet. (Stăniloae 1992: 300)

“The purpose of the “Light”, of the tent from above, it is that of penetrating and gathering together again the ones who got out. This work starts through the descent of the Light on earth, as Embodiment, it continues through Resurrection and it is accomplished for each man when he ascends to seeing it, when he enters the tent from above, at the end of his purification. Through this, the light of the created conscience enters the uncreated and all-luminous “Light”, or the “Life” and the “Conscience”, being penetrated by Him. What we have actually weakened by getting out of the tent from above it is our full “being”, the power of existing and lighting eternally. By being gathered again in Him our power of existing and lighting is being restored. Everything that exist can exist and it can lighten only for it remains inside the “house” lightened, being nourished out of the source of the existence and of the light coming out of it; what comes out of it, it comes in the sphere of the existence of the endless light. Our tent from below will be restored, it will be consolidated, and it will be lightened forever only if it penetrates the true existence and light, or if the true existence penetrates it. “And this true existence is God the One Begotten Who comprises in Himself all the things and Who has set within us His own tent”.

This is the great mystery Moses saw before this mystery being accomplished, and this is too the great mystery experienced by any purified mind that penetrates the light, after it has been accomplished.” (Stăniloae 1992: 301)

“The man’s ascension towards God it starts within Church and it end within Church. Within Church begins and ends the action of man’s consummation; within Church starts and ends the man forever, advancing towards the endless ages from within Church, the Church itself being the bosom of God. Starting and remaining in the seen Church, the man ascends on the Church’s unseen levels, as in a seen tent ascending on the stairs of the unseen tent, and this won’t be else but one and the same, if us, by putting us the unseen tent we do not disrobe the seen tent, but the unseen one being placed over the seen one it penetrates the last one increasingly more. That’s why, the Saints do not leave the Church, but they are on the highest levels of the Church and of their life in God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 301)

Thoughts

“Let’s yield to Christ any innocent thought that appears within us, from the first moment, because any thought is stalked by the “beasts from reeds” (Ps. 63: 31), namely by the evil ghosts, or by our passionate thoughts, which rush out from their hidden places and bites our innocent thought, damaging its beauty or kidnapping it.” (Stăniloae 1992: 128)

“The innocent thought, according to Evagrius Pontius, it can be either angelic or human. The human thought brings in mind the simple form of a thing, for instance of the gold. The angelic thought associates the simple form of a thing to a good meaning, a spiritual meaning. For instance, the good thought by studying the gold’s purposes, it praises God. But the evil ghost or the passionate thought attacks these good thoughts and he associates passion to them. For example, if in the first moment which the man looks at a piece of gold in, or he looks at the gold with a good thought, the evil ghost or the passionate thought by awakening the man’s lust for gold, it bites the good thought and it defiles it, and the good thought is no longer whole and unharmed.” (Stăniloae 1992: 128-129)

“We must guard the innocent thought that appears within us in order not to be grabbed by lust or caught in a passionate cogitation”. (Stăniloae 1992: 129)

“The surest method which we can guard unharmed the simple thought with, or the good thought appeared within us, namely the method which we can stand strong next to our simple thought, it is that of associating the simple thought to the thought at Christ, to bring our simple thought as sacrifice to Christ. By doing this, we avoid to be our thought kidnapped and take on the slope of a passionate cogitation. By doing this we have given our cogitation and will a support, so that they can remain faithful to this first form which the thought has appeared in. Thus, the passion takes the cogitation, without us wanting to, on who knows what paths, causing the so-called phenomenon of scattering our cogitation, until we totally lose the control upon our thoughts, and this brings us to an uncontrolled and passionate external life. The guarding of thought it is a guarding done by the mind to itself. Of course, one cannot stop the mind from continuously working. That’s why we must always watch upon our mind. And the purpose of this vigil is either for, when receiving the thought, this thought to take place in a pious cogitation, producing associations of pious thoughts, or, when appear other thoughts as beginnings of other series of thoughts, to be they too sent, on the first moment, to the healthy riverbed. This is a narrow path, a path upheld by a continuous effort, a path that is very difficult at the beginning, but that it times becomes ever easier.” (Stăniloae 1992: 129-130)

“By always bringing the innocent thought as sacrifice to Christ, at the beginning through the hope that He will make His present felt to us in our heart, because we do not feel His presence for now, we will reach to feel that he is within us, for our heart which He dwells within it will be opened. Actually, this is the heart: the sensitiveness for the presence of Christ and the steadfast sensitiveness for good. In a concrete manner, we will gain the experience that we have a heart only when we feel the presence of Christ, only when our heart is open in order us to see Him. Until we do not see Christ within us, we will not have achieved the “feeling of the mind”, the “feeling of the heart” for Christ, as Diadochus of Photice said, for our heart won’t have been opened, in order from there Christ to unveil Himself to us, and in order Him to overflow upon the whole our soul’s life, His kindness and understanding, united with our kindness and understanding. Until this openness hasn’t been done, this awakening of the “feeling” through mind of the presence of Christ, we must knock on its door, with the thoughts we sacrifice to Christ, hoping that we will achieve the feeling of His presence and by this our heart it will be opened. This is the only means which we can make our heart to be opened though, in order Christ to unveil Himself within us, the only means which we can find that we have a heart through, and Christ in it, which we can to become “people of heart” effectively. We must exercise ourselves in sensitiveness acts, in order us to achieve the sensitiveness. This is for our heart - and Christ from within our heart - they do not receive any passionate, callous, dirty thought, and therefore they do not open to this sort of thoughts. (...) But the faith, the hope, and the love, they express the state of sensitiveness for Christ of the one who knocks on the door of his own heart - for his heart has become through Baptism the home of Christ – with each first-born thought.” (Stăniloae 1992: 130-131)

“By being the heart the dwelling place of Christ within us, by somebody guiding his first-born thought towards his heart it means associating that thought to Christ, or vice-versa. The mind oriented towards heart it has the power of keeping each one of its occurred thoughts clean and unharmed by the passionate attacks. This is for the Holy Ghost is in our heart as a “candlestick of the knowledge” illuminating within us. (...) That’s why is good for our mind to always be with its attention directed towards heart, namely towards the One Who dwells within our heart. (...) When the mind, instead of being focused on its intimacy, on its hearts where Christ is, it entirely overflows towards the external things, in the regions of the passionate movements from within us, or in the senses’ world, it becomes possible the attack of the evil thoughts. Even if it is necessary that the mind to firstly look at the more exterior thoughts, which are brought by lusts, when the mind is focused on Christ it looks at the exterior things in its quality as supervisor, as disciplinarian, and therefore the mind doesn’t become a slave subordinated to those evil thoughts. Usually, these things take place thus: in the first place there occurs in the conscience a simple thought. Immediately after, somewhere at periphery, there occurs an evil thought, kindred to the tendency of take over the simple thought occurred before. Somebody talks to me about gold, making thus to occur in my mind the simple idea of gold. But, immediately after, in a corner of my conscience raises its head the lust, of possessing gold, or the regret of not having gold. The simple thought has stirred up a lust which focuses on another thought. I must associate on the first moment the thought of gold to the thought at God. Thus, the passion's thought will be defeated. It cannot remain neutral for a long time. By associating the simple thought to the thought at God, we have rejected the attack. The attacks will appear in an involuntary mode, to any man almost, even if he is on the most advanced spiritual levels. And sometimes, even if the simple thought is guarded, the passionate thought will persist. This happens when the man is strengthened in his addiction to that sin which the bait brings it." (Stăniloae 1992: 131-132)

"We cannot always defend the simple thought, the first-born thought, against the claws of the beast that stalks the thought. This happens especially when we haven't immediately sacrifice that thought to Christ, and when the mind hasn't directed together itself with that thought towards heart, but it has looked behind, as Lot's wife, at the occurred attack, at the lust which has signaled its – presence in conscience. By forgetting a little about itself, and by allowing to be touched by the breeze of sweetness emanating out of the awakened lust, the mind ascertains that the first born and simple thought it has been stolen from it and it has been bitten by passions. The mind can fight even now, in order the lamb to escape with as small as possible wound, or, anyway, until isn't totally devoured by wolf. This battle is harder but it still must be fought. And the help consists still of the thought at God, and still the running towards the heart it can find this help. God won't delay helping us, if we call upon Him with the whole our power. If we see that the thought at our brother it has been covered with hatred, let's not allow this accompanying to further unfold, and let's pluck the image of our brother from the hatred's corner, at least later." (Stăniloae 1992: 132-133)

"There are also cases which the attack occurs out of nowhere, and not as an echo contrary to an innocent thought which has sprung previously in our conscience. In these cases, even the first thought has the character of an attack. But this is sometimes such a light, a masked attack, so that we cannot suspect its character as attack. It must still be unveiled from the beginning, until won't become out of an ant a lion which we won't be able to get rid of. In order to do this one needs a special spiritual sensitiveness, gained through a steadfast exercise and through a long endeavor of removing the passions." (Stăniloae 1992: 133)

"By steadfastly exercising ourselves and through our long endeavor of cleaning ourselves of passions, the Holy Ghost has become within us an actual power, a power overflows out of Christ, dwelling in our open heart, so that this power illuminates all the overshadowed corners of our conscience and it notices on the first moment every passionate movement, be it however weak and camouflaged at the beginning. But even if we haven't reached yet at this sensitiveness of a long living within our heart, or of a living according to the ghost under the influence and the light of Chris and the Holy Ghost, we can defend ourselves by meeting any thought which occurs in our conscience, with the name of God. If that thought is totally innocent, it will be preserved, by this, in that state; if it is not totally free of passion, it will be cleaned up, by being separated the simple image of the thought from the passion; and if it is totally passionate, it will be quenched." (Stăniloae 1992: 133-134)

"Guarding the thoughts actually consists of a ceaseless mentioning the name of God within our mind, in searching for our heart, or in focusing our mind on itself. But this isn't else but a focused, uninterrupted prayer; still, this prayer is not the clean prayer." (Stăniloae 1992: 134)

Time / History
/ Eternity

“The eternity cannot be the quality of an inalterable substance (even if we would conceive this inalterability as an eternal composing and decomposing), and neither it can be the quality of an eternally valid law which exists in itself. Such a substance, as external object, it lacks the most essential dimension of the inexhaustible character: that of the interiority. And such a law, as object of the rationality, it cannot exist in itself, without a substance, or without a rationality which to be able to cogitate it out of the same eternity. The eternity cannot lack the most essential quality of the inexhaustible character, one that must be in the same time a dimension of the life in plenitude. An eternity that lacks the free and conscious life it is, in the best case, an ambiguous eternity, lacking the plenitude of the experience, and therefore it actually is a false eternity. Even the eternity of a pure rationality it is a monotony that kills, and consequently is a limited one.” (Stăniloae 2003: 178-179)

“The true eternity must be the quality of a consummate subjectivity, for only this one is totally incorruptible and it possesses the most essential dimensions of the inexhaustible character and of the infinite novelty of manifestation: the interiority and the free will. Only the subject is totally not-composed, inexhaustible in his possibilities, and free.” (Stăniloae 2003: 179)

“The godlike life it is a continuously present infinite plenitude, which is not even felt like continuity; this is because where the continuity if being felt, there is also felt the passing and the future is being waited for. In the godlike life there is no past, because through past it is being measured the distance crossed towards consummation; there is no future too, because through future it is being repeated an advancing towards a consummation which is not possessed on the present; in the godlike life there is a present without any reference to the past or to future, for it is being lived always in plenitude.” (Stăniloae 2003: 181)

“God is eternal; for there is no surpassing, at Him, of the existent communion, towards a fuller communion. Such a surpassing it is possible only when the being is limited and in the same time it is capable of growth. That’s why only the human being is capable of surpassing, and this is because the human being isn’t fully submitted to the nature’s laws of repetition and because the human being can grow up out of a truly infinite existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 181)

“The eternity of God it comes out of His plenitude, and it comes out of the fact that he isn’t part of any system of references and He is above the existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 181)

“God is the true eternity, or he has the true eternity, for He is a perfect community of supreme Persons, above any limitation. Only such an eternity it makes possible the understanding of the time and of the report the eternity and the time are in. Such an eternity can no longer be considered as irreconcilable with the time, but, in the same time, such an eternity cannot be considered as identical to the time. The time isn’t something contrary to the eternity, the time isn’t a falling off the eternity, but the time neither is an ongoing eternity. The godlike eternity - as life in plenitude, as dialogue of the eternal and perfect love amongst subjects who are internal to one another – it bears in itself the possibility of the time, and the time, it bears in itself the possibility of being imparted with eternity, a fact that can be actualized in the communion with God by grace.” (Stăniloae 2003: 182-183)

“The human creatures achieve the eternity by moving towards God, in time. Out of this fact we can see that God has created the people and the world for eternity. But one can achieve the eternity by moving towards God, a movement that is being accomplished in time. Thus, the time is the environment through which the eternal God leads the creatures towards their resting into His eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 184)

“The creatures must reach the eternity through an own effort, and effort that is helped by the grace of God. From here it results the positive necessity of the movement and of the time. Thus, the movement in time is used by the divine eternity for attracting the created beings into the divinity’s bosom.” (Stăniloae 2003: 184)

“The eternity that will be installed at the end of the time it will be a concentration of the entire time, together with the efforts made by people, a concentration that till will be penetrated by the divine eternity the man entered in full communion with.” (Stăniloae 2003: 187)

“The eon becomes time when there appears the creation with its movements, and the time becomes eon when the creation stops from its movement into God Who is above movement, as One Who have everything in Himself from ever, and forever and ever. The eon exists as virtuality of the time in the bosom of the divine eternity, without merging with it, as a rationality of the time related to the rationality of the cosmos (Acts 17: 26).” (Stăniloae 2003: 187)

“The time started, without any doubt, in the same time with the created world. Though, without a preexistent eternity, the time couldn’t start. But the time isn’t either a simple period between the endless periods which were and which will be. The eternity from before and that one from after the time, it is something else than the time. But the eternity explains the time, the time that comes out of eternity and it ends into eternity. The time was into eternity as a virtual eon, and it ends into eternity as actualized and made eternal eon, with all the realities lived as unfolded time. And the eternity is at the basis of the time. The time, as unfolding of the eon, it is some kind of ladder stretched towards eternity, or a work of the eternity towards the created world. The time is the ladder stretched towards the eternity of God put to me at hand, according to my measure, through a work of God on my level. This is because I cannot live yet the eternity as such.” (Stăniloae 2003: 187-188)

“The time as such it doesn’t remain exterior to the creature, but it becomes since the beginning a condition of the creature’s ascension. But it is equally true that the creature is made to surpass the movement and the time. One could say therefore that the time is the condition or the dynamic relation of the creature which hasn’t reached into God yet, a relation with the eternal God. Once the creature has fully reached into God, the creature installs itself with its time – a time that has become eon now – in the eternity of God. Then the relationship of God with the creature that reached at the union with Him it has gained a maximum intimacy. In fact, this shows how much the creature is made for God, and how much the creature is tied to the eternity of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 188)

“The eternal God places Himself in a relation of waiting in report with us. Thus appears the report between Him and time. From here we can see that God keeps the time tied on His eternity. The eternity accepts the time within, namely God accepts the creature that lives in time, into His eternity, though the time represents also a spiritual distance between the created persons and God. Thus, the eternity is both in time and above the time. There remains a distance between us and God, but in the same time this distance takes place in the frame of the love, namely of the eternity of God. The distance is therefore the time, as waiting for the eternity directed towards creatures and as hope of the creature directed towards eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 189)

“The time means to God, the duration of His waiting for, between His knocking on the door and our deed of opening that door. He doesn’t enter, forcedly, the people’s heart. The time involves in this sense, also the freedom and the respect God grants to the conscious creatures. The union with God, in love, it cannot be accomplished without the people’s unforced answer to His love. But God, by waiting for, he lives the time without forgetting about His eternity, without getting out of His eternity, whilst us, when we hear His voice, we live a time without being aware of eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 191-192)

“For the acts of God of offering His love, they depend on the levels our capacity of answering it has reached at, we can speak about a “history” of the revelation and of the action of God in His relations with us, about an advancing of His, together with us, in our becoming. But because by our becoming we do not reduce only the duration that separates us from the full union with God, but we also accomplish a continuous advancing in the loving atmosphere of His Person, we can say that our time is being gradually filled up with an increasingly stronger felt eternity. And God, by waiting with hope for us and by living our continuous getting closer to Him, he has the eternity equally present in the time he is waiting for us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 192)

“The duration between the offer from God and our answer to it, it is not, forcedly, only gradually being reduced. We could answer quicker if we wanted to sooner participate, by grace, to God. And some people actually answer quicker. But others disappoint God in His waiting for them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 192)

“(…) we are always stretched before ourselves, we are not locked up in what we are, and we neither have reached at what we want to and our existence requires us to, and we are, relentlessly, on the way, or travelers. The time is the expression of the fact that we do not remain and we cannot remain in what we are, but we neither have reached that plenitude we can rest ourselves in; we are hanging on above the abyss. This is also shown by the fact that we always look for a more satisfying meaning of what we are and of what is around us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 193)

“What is within us, it is the searching for, it is the tendency towards future, towards leaving behind what we are, and the stretching towards another target (Phil. 3: 14; the epektasis of Saint Gregory of Nyssa). This fact attests that we never have within ourselves the sufficiency of the existence in time, and that we are made for eternity. A definitive or prolonger resting, in the present moment, it is not possible as long as we still live an insufficient life, namely in time. The present moment is a moment stretched towards the future; this present moment it is not exclusively a present moment. We do not have, proper-said, a present, because we do not have within us a consummate infinite life. Only God Who is the plenary existence, he is an eternal present. And we can rest ourselves only within Him, for in Him we have the life without limitations. This doesn’t mean that we mustn’t work on each moment. But each act, though an immediate act, it is for the future, it is stretched towards future, and we are alive only because we are stretching ourselves towards the future through the present act. If we want to remain in the state we are in, we are dead, and we are in a life that it is being exhausted in a moment.” (Stăniloae 2003: 194)

“The time, as duration, it always is an interval, or the movement between two ends of a bridge. We cannot endure remaining within interval.” (Stăniloae 2003: 194)

“There is something ambiguous in the time. The time exists and it doesn’t. Thus, it was seen by Saint Basil de Great. The time is the launching from and about to become dead state, over the void, towards a plenitude. The time is the feeling away from Egypt through the Sinai Desert, towards the Promised Land. Remaining on spot, it means dying. We must launch ourselves forwards, by renouncing to a condition menaced by death, with the sure faith that we are going to find the plenitude. The time is leaving of the present as apparent life, as a life being menaced by death, by passing through the void that leads to life, by passing – in a certain way – through the Cross. The Cross is placed between all the moments, and after each Cross, the following moment comes to us as a gift from God. This movement over the void, we are doing it out of the hope in God, by listening, out of faith, to the appeal of God, in order to reach the Promised Land. Actually, this means no longer living for yourself, but for the One Whom you haven’t found yet, or you haven’t found Him fully: dying to yourself. This means accepting the death of an apparent life in order to find the true life. It means defeating death through death. Living in time it means living out of the grace of God, or death and obtaining the life out of the hand of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 194-195)

“Only as interval, and therefore as connection between person and, finally, as connection between the human person and the godlike Person, the time is real and, through this, the time is positive, it is progressive, and it is creator, as the person’s advancing in uniting his life to the others’ life and with the life of God. That time is real as movement of the human person beyond himself, in order to surpass the interval, and not in order to get rid of that interval.” (Stăniloae 2003: 197)

“We reach in eternity only by surpassing the time as interval, and not by avoiding the time. This is because only by surpassing the real interval we unite ourselves with the supreme Person in love. This is because as long as it persists within us a remnant of egotism, namely as long as we haven’t surpassed the interval by crossing it, the supreme Subject doesn’t fully give Himself to us, either because the leap from within me isn’t total, it does not represent a sacrifice, or a gift of my being, or because after a leap lasting only for a moment, I withdraw again within myself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 197)

“When the possibility of an y communication will cease, for in this state there will b e nothing new, one can say that then there won’t be a properly said time, because there won’t be anything of the eternity in that time (we mean out of the true eternity) and that time will be empty of any content.

This is the insignificant time, an inutile time because of its total void, because of the absence of any movement of any direction and of any target. That will be a miserable eternity that is even beneath time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 200)

“The eternity is solidary with the time but without being confounded to the time. The eternity is the origin and the perspective of the time and the force moving the time towards it. At the end, the eternity will overwhelm the time, and it will give the time the quality of eternity. Then will no longer be time (Rev. 10: 6), for we won’t have within us except the love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 204)

“God sees the full union of the creatures with Him and His union with them, at their end, and end that is present to Him. But concomitantly to this union and fullness seen at the end of the creatures, or in their target, God sees also an actual certain lack of fullness and a certain distance. Through this, God sees how the image of the fullness and of the creatures’ total union with Him are within creatures like a potentiality that gradually leads them towards the actualization of the union with him and of their final fullness. God sees the creatures started on this road, and therefore in some real union with Him, and therefore on the road of the full actualization and of the full union with Him, ever since the moment the creature know God as the simple cause of the things. And this is always also a faith in Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 244)

“The expression itself ‘in the beginning’ – when the creator act happens and it appears the creation - it indicates the first union of the eternity of God with the time. ‘In the beginning’ it means both the beginning of the descending of God to time, and the beginning of the time that comes to existence out of the creator power of God, the One thus descended; ‘in the beginning’ it is the first moment of the dialogue of God descended to creature, with the creature that starts his temporal road.” (Stăniloae 2003: 344)

“The ‘at once’ of the world, it is ‘at once’ of the divine will that the world to exist. God produces in Himself an ‘at once’ of His will, which causes the time the world is tied to. “Consenting” to the divine will it means accepting, from the part of God, the relation with the time, which receives existence just by this. Through the ‘at once’ of the divine will it is placed the origin of the time in the divine will, and it is shown that the time doesn’t exist except in its relation with the will of God, a will that is above time. The time doesn’t exit by itself, from eternity, without the divine will, but the time has its origin in the divine will, in an ‘at once’ of the consenting to this will.” (Stăniloae 2003: 346)

“The time not only begins, but also it lasts by the divine will. God hasn’t descended to His relation with the time only to initiate the ‘beginning’ of the time. The beginning by itself, if there hadn’t been time it would have been nonsense to be initiated. For the ‘beginning’ of the time it means the ‘beginning’ of the created things in their potency, because there is not time without things in movement, or bringing the created things to the potential existent lasting only for a moment it would have been meaningless.” (Stăniloae 2003: 346)

“In the ‘beginning’ it is implied the whole distance to be crossed by the created world through time, between beginning and end, but also the will of God to be in continuous relation with the world, in order to bring it to that end He wants it to the world. The divine act of wanting the beginning or of the created world, it implies in itself the wanting of the time or of the created world, until the end, as a whole, as an ‘eon’, or as an ‘age’. And this wanting of the beginning of the time, by being the beginning of the descending of God to the relation with the world that starts existing, it implies the persistence of His continuous descending in the relation with the whole world’s movement in time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 346)

“The time that follows the beginning, or the world unveiling out of its potency, it doesn’t last through itself, as neither their ‘beginning’ doesn’t appear from itself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 346)

“Like the beginning of the time or the world doesn’t spring out of an impersonal potency existing by itself, but they spring out of the decision of the divine personal will, which gives the world the potency, likewise the unfolding of the world it doesn’t come out of its own potency, but it comes out of the potencies God has placed in it, and this configuration unfolding is wanted and therefore sustained in continuation by the power of God. At each apparition of a new order in existence, God says: ‘Let there be’, showing by this that he wants to be it, and, by this, he gives a special power to the new created order. Without the will and the power of God, there wouldn’t appear a new order in existence which to be in conformity to all the other ones.” (Stăniloae 2003: 347)

“Like the first moment of the time has at its basis the eternity, not the eternity of an impersonal substrate but the will of God Who is from ever, likewise each following moment it has at its basis the will of the eternal God Who sustains the world in its development and it continuously calls upon the man to an answer, and through this it makes possible the man’s existence as awoken and intense, or the responsible connection with the eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 349)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor, by discerning between ‘eon’ (αιων) and eternity, he reckons the eon as the eternity full of the experiences of the time, or the time filled up with eternity. There is a final eon that gathers in itself the whole time, as there also exists an initial eon which comprises in God the thought possibilities of all the things which would develop in time. The non-temporal laws of the creation, the ideas of the time, they are such an eon. The angels’ way of life and the future life of the humans and of the world in the future life, they are a final eon. The future life is an eon-ic eternity and not simply the eternity of God. It is about the eternity for the world which is comprised in God and it is potentially given in ‘at once’ and it is gathered again in the eschatological unity passing through time. The initial eon isn’t in movement. The eschatological eon has in itself the experience of the movement and even some kind of stabile and eternal movement around God (as the angels have too in the vision of Dionysus the Areopagite), for the creature reached in God ceaselessly deepens himself in contemplating and sharing the infinity of God, though the creature is always being bathed in the infinity of God. That potential ‘at once’ of the first day it becomes a full ‘at once’ of the eight endless day; getting out of eternity by creation it comes to an end by entering the eternity through resurrection, after the movement in time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 349-350)

“Maybe, before falling, the man was in front of the eon-ic and temporal existence. If the man had consolidated himself in good, he would have become eon-ic, fact that it wouldn’t have meant, though, the absence of the possibility of the progress in good, namely in some kind of time overwhelmed by eternity. This is for also the angels, though eon-ic, they ceaselessly and unchangeably advance into God. By falling, the man has entered a time of change, of corruption, and of death, a time that doesn’t necessarily mean that is a time of the total and inevitable sin, as Karl Barth says. This time remains, at its turn, in a connection to the eternity and in an aspiration towards eternity.” (2003: 440)

“The Providence highlights especially the fact that God isn’t purely a preserver of the world in some cyclical forms, but He is a God of a world called to the perfection of the life in union with Him. He is not the God of making the world eternal in the existing form, but He is the God of a world which He leads it through movement towards the target of consummation in Himself. God worked in past acts, but in acts which brought the world forwards. That’s why we must believe that He works also now in modes adequate to our time, and He will also work in the future, by unveiling Himself increasingly reveal, for fully reveal Himself in the eschatological future.” (2003: 513)

“The man can increase in this spiritual growing up and out of the science that can discover on an increasingly higher level the apophatic meaning of the world, hidden within God, as the man can also gain from the history's experiences. These experiences, if they are good, they carry forwards the human communion; if they are evil, they show the necessity of the godlike help for our existence's true consummation, or their turn us towards good. By and large, everything contributes to the unveiling of the endless complexity of the human possibilities in the reports between people and in their reports with the nature. The true benefit the man must gain from history is, though, the fortifying of the human spirit in order to actualize, in an increasingly accentuated manner, the contingency of the body and of the nature in report with his spirit, in order to discover increasingly more of the true potentialities of the nature." (Stăniloae 2003: 427)

"The savior deeds of Christ have, in addition, the importance that through them the godlike supreme Person demonstrated the most, by their historicity, His real existence and the fact that he entered a relation with us, as Man, in history; he demonstrated that he became even more concretely "historical" by suffering from some factors of the history and by overcoming the raising of some of those factors against Him." (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

"Christ continues to teach His Church, lighting it in understanding His words and His savior work in the context of each time. On the other hand, Christ makes the Church partaker to this ministration, urging the Church's organs, through the Holy Ghost, inwardly, to teach one another. Even in exercising this urge, He is the Supreme Teacher. For He urged the Apostles to bring the teaching from source – or His word –, and the words about Him, to all nations. Then, Christ has been urging the missionaries of all times to make Him known as Savior all over the world. He urges the parents to make Him know to their children, and He urges all the believers to communicate, to one another, their faith in Him, and to clarify to themselves the meaning of His Person and of His savior work. The whole Church is taught by Him and It teaches by participating to His teaching ministration. The ones who collect more from the manna of their teaching, or who sip more out of the living water of this teaching, they give more to others." (Stăniloae 2006: 97)

"We believe that one can go further in recognizing the historical character of the Resurrection. If the persons whom the resurrected Christ appeared are historical persons, through them one could verify, according to all the rules of the historical method, if not the mode of the resurrection and the resurrected body, then at least the fact of the resurrection. This fact doesn't have its verisimilitude in analogy with other historical phenomena, but otherwise it fits the desires of the verification methods of a historical fact. Taking in account that the verisimilitude is a "premise", or a "prejudgment", the researches come with, before any research, he doesn't have the right to refuse, on the basis of this "subjective" apriorism, a fact that, when being researched, it proves to be real." (Stăniloae 2006: 68)

“Christ’s Resurrection is thus, not only verifiable, as a fact that is impenetrable in its content above the contents of the historical deeds, but it opens to us a content of existence from on another plan, with the greatest efficiency upon history. The Resurrection has a great and continuous spiritual causality upon history. Due to the Resurrection, the history isn’t being moving itself only on the limited plan, we would name it as static, which wouldn’t bring us nothing new, but it places us in connection with a content within which the history is being continuously communicating new contents. The Resurrection stays in connection with the history not only by the supra-historical causality which it has brought upon history, but also by the role the Resurrection has had and it continues having it, in introducing a new way of life in history. Christ has Resurrected Himself, for He has overcome through His life the weakness of the human nature with its affects, going in the manifestation of this spiritual strength all the way to accepting the death for others. Without fully entering the history, as an effect and as a cause, Christ entered a certain connection with the history, by bringing certain effects within history and by having the role of a causality upon history, in order to open the history’s access to the overcoming the mode of existence in a simple immanent repetition which leads nowhere, which doesn’t bring the history out from under the death’s mastery.

In this sense, we must take in consideration not only the fact that the historical research reaches to some persons whom the resurrected Christ appeared and it reaches at the empty tomb, and the fact that on one hand the resurrection has within itself the possibility to make itself noticed by historical persons, and on the other hand, that the historical persons are, in principle, capable to bear witness, and therefore they are capable of noticing the reality of the superior fact of the resurrection of Christ, but also the fact that the content of the resurrection it elevates and it enriches the mode of the historical life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 68-69)

“The whole our existence on earth it has a unique, decisive importance. The time is exclusively its form, ad this give the time a decisive value, a value corresponding to that one of eternity. The historical life on earth itself is elevated above relativity, for only on it depends the obtaining of the absolute life in God. It becomes absolute by participation, if we are to translate the patristic expression of deification by participation. The time is thus also a grace. The eternity cannot be transformed under the form of new and gradual decisions and acts. This would mean to transform the eternity in time.” (Stăniloae 1997: 168)

“If the time had been eternal, if the time had been stretching itself like an infinite pond out of eternity, the time would have lost its decisive importance and any historical deed would have lost its unique importance. Whenever one can do anything, whenever one can repair anything, in a relative meaning. Nothing is tied to a historical moment, or to a person. There is not real progress; everything becomes a tiresome uniformity. There is no hurry for any appeal to be answered. You can postpone the answer indefinitely. We know that there is an endless time for decisions, to that we always postpone our decision. Neither the eternity is a frame for new decisions, nor is the endless time a frame pressing you to make a decision. That's why the eternity is no longer the frame which we gather in the eternal fruit of our decision made in time. And eternal time is no longer a frame for real consummation." (Stăniloae 1997: 168-169)

"There is nothing worse than postponing a decision as much as possible, and there is nothing bad in doing the required good now. The drowsiness philosophy appears in this case as being the wisest. In the eternal reigning of such a time there is no stage of the decisive existence." (Stăniloae 1997: 169)

"If there hadn't been a time for mandatory decisions, then no human person would have been important, neither all of them together – of the ones who consummate themselves. Of, there wouldn't have been a person having a unique character related to his time. If there had been possible to speak about persons any longer, they would have been uniform. You could have killed any person, because of any other person could replace him. No person, not even all of them together, could have moved the time out of its relativity neither they would have moved themselves towards absolute, in order to become able of it. If there still is a reality parallel to the eternal time, it will be exclusively reserved for the consummate from ever eternal Person of God Who doesn't need to consummate Himself. But what eternity would be that out of which a divine Person cannot use a time, by creating it and by acting Himself in that time, in order to make other persons eternal?" (Stăniloae 1997: 169)

"Only God as Person is eternally consummate, and He invests each human person with a unique value. A time eternally closed in platitude and relativity it hasn't room for the absolute of the divine Person Who to maintain with each person a relation of absolute interest. Such a time cannot have a relation with a real eternity and it cannot be filled up by a real eternity." (Stăniloae 1997: 169)

"One cannot discover the sense of the history within history, the judgment upon history it cannot be uttered during history, because of this meaning that the history has reached its end while still continuing, and that is impossible. That's why the unveiled showing of Jesus Christ with His consummately deified humanity cannot take place within history. This is for this deified humanity itself is beyond history. The history is by its being a road, and not final resting, it is a tension not reached at its end. The history is time and in time isn't everything given in a concentrated mode. Without reckoning that within history the evil is necessarily done, as long as the history lasts, we say that the history still doesn't possess the whole good. The history is the domain of the movement towards consummation, and not of which the consummation has ceased in; the history is the domain of the relativity, of the not-full unveiling, leaving room for suppositions, for possibilities, and for ambiguities. One cannot reach from this tension to resting by evolving, but only through a jump which doesn't stay in the possibilities of what is in tension, in movement, and in the history's powers. It is necessary a stopping of the history done from above, for the mankind to be crossed to a supra-historical existence." (Stăniloae 1997: 251)

"The history has developed if not in a uniform manner, at least doubly (ambiguously) the potentialities places within it by God and renewed and consummated in Christ. The history has ultimately highlighted, in the relative limits depending on it, the theme of the man as supreme being of the visible creation, destined to know the work of God and to know himself in his value that is superior to all creatures. If doesn't everybody use this maximum development of the human potentialities, for through them they to see beyond the finite immanence, this is due to the man's freedom, which God doesn't want to annul." (Stăniloae 1997: 260)

"Into the history there are mixing three plans of the reality. There is the plan of the nature, or of the physical laws, the plan of the juridical relations amongst people or of the social order embodied into the State, and the plan of the loving communion with God and with the fellow humans or the Church. The first two are governed by God like a Providential One. It is the order of the physical and social legality which must be observed by every man, if he does not want to be crushed by its reaction. The history can be composed only of these two plans too. But then it makes no sense. Living according to the laws of the nature, and into a state order, it still does not mean living for a certain goal. Neither a man nor a collectivity can live with the thought that they have no other meaning but to obey the order of the nature and of the society, for a number of years, and then to die. Usually, when only two these plans are recognized like history's constitutive factors, the culture is presented like a goal of it. But the culture is either the sum of the experiences and of the conclusions regarding the adaptation of the man to the legality or to the nature - or of its legality to the necessities of the man, together with the sum of the experiences and of the trying of reciprocal accommodation of the people amongst them for the keeping of the social order like an elementary condition of life - or it is the sum of the endeavors of the man to connect the fate of his own being to the values which pass over the margins of his earthly existence, projecting himself into eternity. In the first case the culture is not but a searching for the fullest order and, so, it has no other goal which to exceed the simple passing of the existence in the frame of it. In the second case, it betrays the aspiration of the man to find a goal to the physical and moral order, into which generations after generations are set to live. When the culture would be limited only to the preoccupations of the first case, no matter how much it would be modified the history from a time to another, it still would be conceived like having a static character. So, the following question will be an appropriate one: why it continues the string of the generations?

Instead, while the culture is considered like the product of the human longing to tie the being on eternal values and realities, if there would had been no possibility to fulfill this longing, the man would have been proven like the slave of an illusion and then the culture he creates it would have had, at its turn, an illusory substance and eternity. The living into the physical and social legality it wouldn't have had a purpose either in the second case - at most an illusory one.

The history, though, it cannot be conceived without a real goal. It is too strong the finalist tension from within it, too dominated by the tendency towards a goal in any domain and in any collectivity, to not be any other end but the collapsing into dust, one by one, of each generation, after a short living into the legality of the nature and of the State.

The goal of the history is shown in the third plan - a plan superior to the two kingdoms of legality - in the kingdom of the divine grace, leading towards the eternal life. Properly said, the first two plans form a whole, which the third one is radically different from. The kingdom of the law and the kingdom of the spirit or of the divine grace, they stay face to face. The first one is being governed by God like Upholder; the second one is being governed by Jesus Christ, the Savior Son of God.

A history combined only of the part of the nature and of the State, it would have been therefore not only without any goal, but opposite to the goal and, so, abnormal. God doesn't allow this one like a definitive form, but, after the falling of the mankind into sin, He prepares again the establishment of a kingdom of the divine grace. The history itself, into this fallen state, it longs after the filling of itself with the Revelation and with the godlike powers, which to illuminate its path and to help it to tend towards the real goal." (Stăniloae 1993)

The history will continue until will have been fully done, besides the salvation of some individuals from so many generations of people, its sense, or until it will no longer able to serve the goal to be an arena which the people to gain their salvation in. It seems like these two answers stay in a close connection.

The general sense of the history must be a fullest possible explanation, verification, and framing into the universal-human experience of the truth of the Revelation, which is not something else but the manifestation of God towards people like a subject of communion with the calling towards communion. And this means just the spiritual fulfillment of the mankind. In all the generations, starting with Jesus Christ, there is a big crowd of people who lives with the absolute certitude of the Revelation of God into Jesus Christ and in the communion established between them like being on earth and Him like sitting on the right hand of the Father. Also, into this faith of them, which expresses the reality of the fact, they are saved. But as much they live in early époques, as much their fate, even of an absolute character, it is less amplified like light which, developed parallel with the experience of the generation and with the exploration of the physical and spiritual Universe, in order to became a crowning of a maximum understanding, verified itself by the necessity with which it is asked after it the sum of the human experience and understanding. We have seen that a part of the human culture it is the constantly increased sum of the knowledge of the nature for necessities of adaptation and of the law of human cohabitation for the same necessities. Another part is everything that human spirit adds in the effort to exceed the time. All this culture longs, vaguely but intensely, for the truth of the communion of the man with God, like longing for a fulfillment, without being able to produce, by itself, the certitude of this communion, and to establish the ideal mode of it. The divine Revelation, descended into the riverbed of the human spirit, it is parallel illuminated with the multiplying of the experience of the man about himself and about the world and it appears increasingly like a crowning of this experience, by becoming the most important part of the human culture. Today, much more than few hundred years ago, the truth of the Revelation into Jesus, without being changed, it is more profoundly understood, more amply, and put in a connection with the whole plus of the knowledge and the nature, and of the man, achieved during this interval, imposed by this plus, verified through it and, at its turn, illuminating it.

It is not, in what we are saying, about a progress of the culture, taken in an objective meaning, or a matter of knowledge, but it is about the total stages of knowledge which the individuals believe in. The believers, after hundreds or after thousands of years, even if they believe in the same unique truth of the Revelation, with the same absolute certitude, in their conscience this truth confirms and crowns – being in the same time confirmed and illuminated – a vaster and deeper human experience.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But the history, usually, it cannot last reduced only to these rules took as such, or like simple brakes against the selfish passions. History like a whole, it desperately needs the striving towards the search of the fellow human through the faith in God, towards the unselfish communion. This is the history’s salt, without which the history rots and it collapses in chaos. Without the communion report between people, which to be activated through the propagation of the faith from one to another, even the basic rules of the history become impossible to be observed. This is because these ascensions into the sphere of the communion between people, they shake the history up. The history’s rules system, like the whole history’s life too, it’s like a mountain’s vein which the gold lode of communion prolongs itself within, by being established between man and man, through the propagation of the faith. It is the big river which carries continuously the string of ships loaded with the divine Revelation’s burden of gold.

The history's role is to be the environment which the Revelation propagates within. Not the history itself it produces the Revelation, neither the history propagates the Revelation by itself. But the history forms the substrate in which it descends and in which it prolongs the fire from above.

The reports between people within the frame of the historical rules they don't determine - by themselves - the faith to propagate from human being to human being. When into the core of these reports there is not a communication of the faith too, they decay and the history become chaos. A father, whose report with his son it is not passed through by the arch of the faith too, he cannot be father at height; a merchant who, even into his commercial function, he does not let himself mastered also by the conscience of his responsibility for himself and for his soul, and for his fellow human's soul, he becomes to be a diluting factor of the society." (Stăniloae 1993)

"History seems to us placed into a positive light - without idolizing it like a reality sufficient to itself. It has the mission of a bosom, in which descends and through it is being transmitted the Revelation. There is no incompatibility between history and Revelation, neither is there an identity. History does not save, but we can save ourselves within history's frame. He who compels himself in the history's frame, to conscientiously fulfill his legal duties, by being a good father, or a honest merchant, or a worthy clerk, without being him saved by this fact alone, he doesn't commits anything wrong but, a contrary, he is a good instrument to preach God.

The reforms and the progresses of the history have, consequently, the meaning that they make the reports between human beings more and more righteous, and more appropriate in order the Revelation to descend within them and to be conveyed by them.

Not all the historical rules are of the same quality. The family's rules allow the most intimate report, but also the other rules are necessary for the social order which makes the rules and the more intimate reports as possible. Not only the substance of the brain, though it directly works the cogitation, it is necessary, but also the environment, and usually there is necessary the thicker shell of the body too. Not only the family but also the friendship is necessary, both of them like rules of the most intimate reports between human beings; and there is necessary also the state which assures the peaceful existence of the family and the commercial reports which ease the hardships of providing for the human beings.

On this way, besides the final target at which it is destined to reach and about which we are going to speak in another place, the history fulfills on each moment his meaning, because, at any time a human being would live, he can be imparted with faith propagated through the history and, when dying, he can be saved. Besides these, within history there is fulfilled also a unitary meaning, whereas, in its frame, it is accomplished, through the propagation of the faith, the solidarity amongst people, whose depth and seriousness it consists of the fact that it is a solidarity based on each one's gratitude to his forerunners and on the responsibility towards successors in what concerns the eternal life. History makes us responsible towards others for eternity and this forces us to take care of the successors by conveying them the faith. The history cannot be attributed a more serious or a graver meaning than that of uniting the whole mankind forever and ever, on the grounds of the responsibility. The ones from the end of the world, whereas one does not know the end, they manifest also a certain attitude towards the successors, if they are conscious. But especially, they manifest their solidarity or their carelessness towards their ancestors by keeping the faith.

From this one appears clearly the role of the tradition. No one receives the faith from God on an isolated way, through vertical history - like Thielicke would say -, but God or the vertical history meet him through the horizontal history. Every sect headman owns his belief to the community from which he has emerged, or, in a final analyze, to the Apostolic Church. This importance of the history like a whole, instead of diminishing the importance of each moment and of each human face, it amplifies it in an overwhelming way. Not only that every human being, no matter when he or she lived, they can be saved, they can realize themselves like a fully me through communion and faith, but they have a major influence over the salvation or the loss of the future generations." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Historicity and supra-historicity, historic-human contingency and godlike absoluteness, the showing in a finite form of a human person in time and space and the supra-spatial, and supra-temporal infinity, do not abolish each - other, but they harmonize each - other, giving us the whole Revelation of God.

If Christ had remained only into His supra-historical infinity and absoluteness, God would have not wholly revealed Himself. We would have remained into a permanent equivocal whether the ideas which we have about God are not simple products of our subjectivity. By appearing in history like a you exterior to every one of us, we can meet Him into a concrete face, which defends against any subjectivity. But if this historical face had been only a temporal and finite one, and hadn't comprise in it the godlike infinity, and it didn't last forever and ever, above time, then God wouldn't have come close to us and He wouldn't have become accessible to us, like One who wouldn't have fulfilled His Revelation." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Under the reign of the Law, the time is not uniform, but it has a development. In fact, it is not about the time, but about the mankind, because the time is not an empty scheme in which are arranged the man's deeds and moods, and his states of mind like objects into the space, but it is the chaining of these deeds and states itself. And because the total of the life of a man it is determined and it determines the one of the other people, the complexity of the states and human deeds, namely the time, it becomes different on each step, by flowing together countless immanent influences and mysterious transcendental causes.

This complexity had under the Law the general development which we've spoken about. It was progressing on this way until it was filled up with all the conditions, which made understood and necessary the descending of the Son of God on earth. This was "the fullness of time".

This expression doesn't mean "at the established term" on the line of a formal time, an unqualified one. It means the general state of the soul, filled up by the conditions needed for receiving of integral Revelation; only due to this fact, that moment is also a "established term". If this expression meant simply a fixed term, it would be legitimate the question: why God established it so late?" (Stăniloae 1993)

"While in the meaning of the "filled time", we understand that it is required a certain development, a certain accumulation of experience from the part of the mankind, until it starts suffering the state of non- communion in which it is with God, to ardently wishing the state of the communion and to definitively realizing the insufficiency of the Law, namely the insufficiency of his own powers to fulfill the Law. The man, like a limb of the society, he arrives to certain views and understandings on the basis of the gradually gained experiences. This is the law of the growth and of the fulfilling of the human soul. God does not annul the human soul; if that had been the case, the man would have not been a man and God would have annulled the creation.

"The fullness of time" it means negatively that the man was filled by the finding of his insufficiency, and positively by the sentiment of the necessity of God's help. The man is in the state of the one who waits for and tensely begs: "Come, God". This sense is completed with the one of moment, which could be filled with the presence of God. "The fullness of time", like an exact point in time, it is not an anterior moment to the conception of the Son of God from Virgin Mary, but it coincides with this fact. Exactly into the instant of the fullness of time Jesus descended into time. The time was "filled up" through historical development from the part of the man and though the descending of God. The "filled up time" is the supreme tension moment in waiting, but it is also of the satisfaction of this waiting, of its overcoming in accomplishing of the promise. If that supreme moment of waiting had not been satisfied by the descending of God, there it wouldn't have had the character of "fullness of time". Thus, "the fullness of time" means also the moment starting from which we have a time full of God, whereas His Son has become man and He remains man forever, by living the time with us, by filling up the time, or the human life's flowing complexity, with the supreme reality, with the supreme ennobling power. The time from before Christ, it was not full with this presence. God fulfilled and helped only from distance. It was felt a certain void in time²⁴⁸. Now we do not feel it anymore. Now it is a perpetual feast

²⁴⁸ With no matter how much agitation and human pretense would be filled the time up, you feel what empty it is like, what monotonous it is like, when there isn't in it but only that. Everything the man does, only like a man, it is shallow, it is only appearance and vainglorious photography. Everything is chaff which burns without any meaning into the fire of a serious regard, of a realistic one. The whole history is a meaningless writhing. Until you enter the chamber of the communion with your fellow human, to whom you grant a non-passing reality, everything is futility. "Nothing has to tell us so much like the history, but it also hasn't to tell

because this is the sense and this is the experience we make into the feast: the fullness of divine presence, so, of happiness and shininess²⁴⁹. Only now the time is full with its sense and value, for the life gains value in time only through the embodiment of God in time.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In order to insist a little more upon the human aspect of the fullness of time, it is necessary to say that the man could not tell exactly what he expects God to fulfill his insufficiencies and longings like. He felt vaguely that for this it is necessary God to be closer than through the prophets and to be a communion’s God, not a God of the commandments. God knew however that this thing cannot be done better, or more consummately, than through His embodiment and sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Withdrawing ourselves from the middle of the historical life it would be a mistake.

But it is a bigger mistake to hurry up in the process of walking the path. It is useless to search for finishing earlier the life from here. At the full eschatological life, we won’t reach before the entire time of the world had come to an end. Everyone waits for the resurrection until there will everybody has come. The postponing of the personal resurrection until the end of the entire world and until the universal judgment, it means a confirmation of the value of the history, of the collective complex which every man has a mission in. The universal judgment does not mean only a judgment of every individual, when it is made the judgment of everybody, but it also means an overall judgment of the mankind, over its common work, of the history. From this overall judgment it will be detached the judgment of every individual.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“To Bulgakov, the development of the history of the good ones²⁵⁰, it would us nothing decisively... History like a state it doesn’t know fulfillment, but only the aspiration towards it” (Brunner, der Mitteln, p. 270-1). “The History is, about its being, the one which can’t reach its goal. Because it is constantly moving in this part of the trench, which separates the man from his goal and origin. Where this trench is crossed over..., there the “time if full”. (Brunner, W. c. p. 272). We agree Brunner’s idea that this filling up of the history it means also the destruction of it, we agree.

²⁴⁹ Hochzeit, Vollzeit – these words are used by Germans to name the time of supreme joy: the wedding - to the consummate communion.

²⁵⁰ Even S. Bulgakov - who speaks in such an accentuated manner, about the development of the world according to a plan from above the people - he affirms in some places that the end of the world depends also on people. The people may hasten it or they may delay it. “The second coming of Christ is not only a unilateral act, but a bilateral one, like the first coming. There must come the time for it. And that time, together with other conditions, it is determined also through the human liberty. Hanging by this the time can be shortened or prolonged, even this at God’s command Who establishes the times and the moments. In this sense, the second coming appears not only like a godlike deed, but also like a human work, which it is done on the ways of the history” (p. 464). P. Althaus, “Die letzten Dinge”, 1933, affirming that “the signs of the end” from Apocalypse refers to the events contemporary to the writer, he sustains that the world will have not to fulfill a plan before and then the end to come. This idea would numb into us the tension, the waiting, and the awareness, it would make from eschatology a simple theory, instead of being a vital matter. The dominant idea of the Apocalypse is that God can come in any moment and, so, we must be continuously ready, like in any moment our personal death could come (p. 265-268). But, without excluding the possibility of the end in any moment and, though, we cannot depreciate the creation and the history, in such a degree, to not admit the culminate, it seems, into a perfecting of the entire creational system, in such a way that the end to not means anything else but a transposition of it in a transfigured form on a transcendent plan, into a fully rehabilitated communion of the world with God, into a remaking of the Sophia form of the creation. The world would end, so, when would reach the end the development of its possibilities of perfecting under the leadership of Jesus Christ, in the framework of this order.

The problem of the unbeliever ones it is not put with acuity at Him. The question: "What would happen with them at the end?" does not occur, at all, into his book.

But the vision of the full maturation of the world for its transfiguration into the eternal union with God, it must be completed with the vision of the last evil's development, so that to be ripen for the final judgment and for the eternal condemnation. "The idea of the final judgment it would be incomplete if there wasn't tied to it in, in the same time, the notion of a completion of the evil and of the justification of its condemnation through the second arrival of the Lord"²⁵¹.

Of course, the evil will of Satan, taken in itself, it is whenever ripened for the eternal condemnation (Die Reife des satanisches Willens). But here is about reaching this stage of the mankind as enemy to God, about the last fruit of the satanic will, through its influence upon people.

The end of the world and the final judgment will be brought also by such a development and petrification into evil of a part of the mankind, so that, on one hand, not to fit there any hope of its straightening, and on the other hand, its eternal condemnation to the fully justified. We could not even imagine that degree of bitterness against God, and of obduracy into that. That is why it is hard to us to understand the eternal condemnation. The obduracy of a part of the mankind into evil must reach to that satanic measure, so there to be nothing more to do for its straightening, the spiritual death of the hell not being anymore but an organic consequence.

This state will make impossible the living of the believers on earth. So, the consummation of the good ones it will equal the capacity of each one to receive death like a martyr, and the consummation of the evil, with the absolute interdiction of the existence of the believers. The world will have developed to maximum its possibilities in both directions²⁵². Not only fact that God seeks through them, a certain sense. This attitude could agree the Protestantism, to which there is not, in creation and in history, any positive sense, because the form of God into man was totally destroyed and it cannot be restored. But we must say that we can be wrong in our appreciations upon the way in which would look like, the fulfilled form of the world.

²⁵¹ W. Küneth, Die Theologie der Auferstehung, p. 259. "Der Gerichtsgedanke wäre unvollständig wenn nicht zugleich mit ihm der Begriff einer Vollendung des Bösen und seines Gerichtet werdens in der Parusie verbunden ist."

²⁵² Wilhelm Koepp, in "Die Welt der Ewigkeit", Berlin-Lichterfelde, Edwin Runge-Verlag, 1921, he thinks that like the individual dies of old age, likewise the mankind, as a whole, it will come to an end by getting old. The getting old of the individual it means not only an exhaustion and a physical stiffening, but also a "callousness of the vital creator power, and a mechanization of the personality", the man becoming incapable of something new. But the believer, who anticipatorily tastes the infinite life of the eternity, he doesn't get old with his soul, but his life is continuously inwardly renewed. Death is to him, therefore, not an emaciation of his spiritual vitality, but a passing to "eternal youth", full, and unhindered by something (p. 32). In this way the mankind will be with like a whole too. The idea of an endless progress of the mankind it started to be positively, but also negatively the people contribute to the coming of the end. Among people live very much these new ideas, manifested into the thought that, at the end, God will no longer tolerate the worsened mankind. The world will end in this way, not through unfounded intervention of God, but by the fact that people will impose the end, by making of the world an arena of continuous laceration.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“This actualization of the Scripture and of the events from within it, this way of understanding the Scripture by any soul as referring to himself in the concrete circumstances which he is in, it gives the temporal moment an auxiliary role in understanding the Scripture, as also in understanding the nature. The Scripture is eternally the same but also eternally new to each moment of the creation unfolding. The problems which our time poses to us, the preoccupations imposed to us by our time, the theme which our time brings to us, my soul’s straining when facing them and under their pressure, without introducing into Scripture new meanings which aren’t objectively in the Scripture, they unveil in continuity to the meanings unveiled so far, new meanings, formulated in new concepts, which are solidary to the former concepts. In this it is shown that the Holy Ghost doesn’t avoid the time, but he crosses through time and he transfigures the time. Our spiritual contents will eternally preserve something of the color of the time which we live in.” (Stăniloae 1992: 187)

“God gets the people of Israel out of the slavery in Egypt “with a strong hand” (Exodus XIII: 14) and lead them to Canaan, but also by His own will. Each time when the people of Israel refused to obey God, He forsook them. Thus, God doesn’t make the history directly, but the people does it. But in all the great deeds the people are helped by God, because they want to considered by the newest cogitation a utopia. They are speaking about the childhood, the youth, and the aging and death of the cultures (Oswald Spengler). But like the cultures are aging, it is extremely probable that the mankind will age too. We can add to this the rapid means of propagation of the ideas in the broad strata of the society, namely the technique, as they are hurrying up the process of the aging of the mankind. After the less developed peoples will have been pulled out from the state of nature, through the means of rapid civilization of the technique, what reserves of youth would the world still have? The state of senescence of the mankind it is describe by Koepp with the analogy to senescence of the individual and, especially, according to the example of so many historical cultures, which got old and died: “all will be senile, tired, weary, mechanized, obdurate, pure civilization, exhausted life, an exterior life, without a soul... a life of orgies with the illusion of rejuvenation, attachment to world, total lack of morality, an affectedness interweaved with the unchaining of any bestial passion, a skepticism and a despaired pessimism in front of the human helplessness to remake the spiritual vigor of the mankind” (p. 35). It would not mean this an aging also of the ones who believe? Koepp answers negatively. He indicates the example of the groups which, in the middle of disappearing cultures, they were manifesting the most powerful spiritual vitality, for instance, the Christianity at its appearance in Palestine and Minor Asia, or the examples from the individual life, which show us individuals who are not subjected to the general law of spiritual aging. The Christian community will increase in the Christian living and it will reach the highest peaks, as the mankind, in general, it will get away from God and it will persecute the faith. “At the end, when the mankind will come closer to its death, the world of the ones without God it will gather all the dying power for a last worship of the immanent and towards a radical persecution of all it is divine and eternal. And so, the ultimate fate of God’s kingdom on earth it will be the following: outside enmity and persecution like never was, and inside and in the middle of this persecution, the burning love, all the greater, of a Johannine époque” (p. 38).

follow God's advice and to receive God's help. Any act of God's revealing it is followed by a free act of the people Israel, and it takes in account this free decision of the people. The more energy and pretention are manifested in an act of divine revealing, the greater is the effort that follows from the part of the people Israel. Moses is a strong creator of history personality, for God give him and demands from him great deeds; the efforts of the people Israel during the Exodus, of the wandering through desert, and of conquering their fatherland, efforts consecutive to several acts of revealing of God's powers and commandments, are at their turn remarkable, for the commandments are insistent and the granted help is huge." (Stăniloae 2005: 11-12)

"The act of getting the people Israel out of Egypt and of settling them down in Canaan, it intended to make out of them a people devoted to God, a people which to manifest their devotion through the deeds established by a Law given them by God, through Moses. Through this is established an "alliance", a special bond, a "covenant" between God and the people Israel, in full freedom.

This alliance crossed through all kinds of variations, due to the fickleness of the people Israel. Each time the people Israel didn't fulfill their obligations in this alliance, the help from God forsook them. Each time the people Israel turned back to fulfilling their obligations, God turned towards them, and He helped them through new deeds of His power. Thus, the history is made by the man, not only when he fulfills the will of God, but also when he doesn't." (Stăniloae 2005: 12)

"God didn't aim through the alliance with the people of Israel that they to extend their worldly power all over the earth, namely not a domination of the history in the proper meaning of the word. If God had pursued this purpose, He would have been fulfilling it. But then the human factor – which in this case was disproportionally small relating to such a purpose: a small people put in the positions of dominating a multitude of peoples – would have achieved this goal, but the divine factor. God aimed, by setting the people of Israel free, to accomplish a spiritual universal mission and only in order this mission to be fulfilled He guides them and He helps them; God aimed the elevation of the people Israel to a superior conception about Him, and to a corresponding moral life, and by this He aimed the spreading all over the world of such a conception and of such a life, concomitantly to the mankind's unification in superior principles of thinking and of life." (Stăniloae 2005: 12-13)

"For God wants to lead the world towards ever higher targets of knowledge and of life, each act and word which He reveals through what he expects from the people Israel or from the small number of the ones who accept to do His will, it opens the whole perspective upon these targets, namely it has a prophetic meaning, it unveils the progressive sense of the history. Even the ceremonial acts of the Law keep open this progressive perspective, by having more or less hidden prophetic meaning. This is for all the sacrifices maintain in the people's conscience the idea that superior acts of sacrifice are needed for a tighter unity with God, for a superior moral life. The ceaseless leading of the people Israel or of its "remnant" that remained devoted to God, on this ascending road, it implies a continual action of God, namely an action adapted to each stage of the history, to the problems of each historical period. From here comes the need for understanding the work of God within world, as always adapted to the moment which it takes place on. This adaptation doesn't aim only a subjective changing of the understanding, under the influence of some new circumstances and problems of the historical life, but also an answer to a God's continuously adapted action, to the new level the mankind is on, under His ascending guiding." (Stăniloae 2005: 13-14)

"In the Christian faith and vision there are three stages in the God's unveiling, in the closeness between God and creation, in the creation's spiritualization. It is the period from the falling of the proto-parents to John the Baptism, the period from the embodiment, crucifixion, resurrection, and ascent of Christ and the descent of the holy Ghost to the end of time, and the live following after the end of time in eternity.

The first period was a period of God's action rather from distance, rather through commandments and rather of creating some legal-theocratic premises, in order to help the people through external, earthly and political motifs, in order they to remain in the faith in One God, and they to prepare themselves and the world by and large, for the state of a greater closeness of God, for the period of a greater spiritualization. That was rather a period of Messianic waiting, the period of knowing and of foretasting God in shadows riddles, and symbols; and God was sending His help from distance.

The second period is that of achieving the full union with God, and of the full spiritualization, but only in One Person: in Jesus Christ. To the others is the period of receiving an earnest of this full union with God. During this period, the full union, achieved as first fruit in Christ, it tends to become generally spread. The period until Christ was the period of Messianic waiting, the preparation period for receiving Messiah.

The third period, namely from after Christ, to the end of the world, it is the period of eschatological waiting, of preparation for the extending of the complete spiritualization achieved into Christ, to everybody and to all things." (Stăniloae 2005: 17)

"All the images from the Old Testament have a character of inconsistent shadows in comparison to the consistent image of the Christ's humanity (Hebr. X: 1), in which the Son of God is whole and in a definitive mode as Person. The images from the Old Testament had a prophetic character. They hadn't a full reality in themselves, but they were preceding projections out of a reality that was to come. God Who indicated them through Revelation as images, he was unveiling a project to be accomplished in the future, a Revelation that was also an object for historical perfecting, and through those images God created a historical and missionary conscience in the people of Israel, an expectation, of better said a Messianic tension. This people knew that they were going or that they were led through history towards a higher spiritual target, and that the shadows, which has the character of a reduced earnest of the presence of God, they will give room to the full reality of the God's presence. The mythology, on the opposite, it doesn't follow a historical plan. The mythology is a cyclical repetition, because of the gods being personification of the cyclical phenomena of the natures, personification of passions, and somehow unfree and without the capacity of pursuing some goals." (Stăniloae 2005: 26-27)

"If the history had been only a repetition of some human acts, which have been essentially identical, then the history wouldn't have been too different from the nature's repetition and lack of a purpose, so that it wouldn't have made any sense and it wouldn't actually be history. The history will truly be history only if it advances towards a target from above history. This target was opened to history by the Christ's resurrection. The resurrected Christ leads the history towards everybody's resurrection. "The Revelation of the God's possibility and power in the resurrection of the Crucified One, and the tendency and the intuition of God that can be recognized in this, they form the horizon that must be and that can be called as history", and it truly upholds the waiting for something new in history. Of course, we do not get closer to this new through miraculous acts, which will be produced by God in nature and in history, but through an ascension of spiritualization, which, without any doubt, are manifested also inwardly, through perfecting the social relations and through a taking under control of the nature by the genius of an evolved mankind. Advancing towards the resurrection of Christ it means advancing towards the Kingdom of God, which, by being a perfect community, it must be prepared by developing the spirit of communion." (Stăniloae 2005: 21-22)

"Because death was mastering upon the people within history, because the people were born out of pleasure, through the chain of pleasures and pains ending in death, it is shown that the history, if hadn't had lasted endlessly, it would have been senseless. In order to break this chain of endless crossing from pleasures to pains, and vice versa, namely to give the history a meaning, the Son of God was born man, not-born out of pleasure, namely not-submitted at all to the pleasure, but assuming and willingly enduring the pain, including the death, in order He to defeat death. By doing that into history, He has given the history a meaning, by making the history and environment of preparation for the eternal life, one lacking not only the bodily pleasure but also lacking the pains. Actually, if the history had remains endlessly without having, within itself, this meaning as preparation for the eternal life that lacks the pleasures and the pains, the history wouldn't have had any meaning. Thus, the birth out of Virgin, without sin, the cross, as last pain and death for us and His resurrection, are the deeds which Jesus Christ gives the history a meaning through, or which are a luminous light to the history as path towards eternity." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 108)

"The mankind lives within Church, in the most accentuated manner, the presence of the eternity in time. On holidays one lives, therefore, in a high degree, the exceeding of the moving succession of the time. A time without holidays it would have been a time which the past had had almost nothing changed within itself." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 166-167)

"The holidays give the time a certain permanence, or eternity. This is for Christ remains forever alive, and the saints remain alive too. The year of the holidays remain in the same starred Sky, overwhelmed by the same Sun." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 167)

"During holidays, the people forget, in a certain measure, about the time's moving. They are no longer preoccupied with the worries related to time. They feel themselves, on Christmas, into Christ Who is being born again on that day. When celebrating a Saint, the people feel themselves elevated, to a certain extent, together with the respective Saint, in the godlike eternity and fullness, into a light of the meaning. We live a special light on the holidays consecrated specifically to Christ. And if we take in account the fact that all the holidays are dedicated to the Saints, we can consider that, for the Church and for the believers, to some extent, the time receives within itself the light of the eternity; namely, the time I no longer a pure succession, lacking a meaning, or obeying the mankind to a meaningless passing." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 167)

"Through sin it has been introduced in the human nature the fact that the conceiving of children is accompanied by pleasure, and that means a weakening of the spirit and an enslaving of the man to the material things, and this brought too, the body's pains, through the process of the decomposition. Thus, the history was born, as a chain of crossings from pleasures to pains, and vice versa, as a chain upheld by the extreme weakening of the soul and by the decomposition of the body into death. But in such a history, or in such a time as crossing of other and other people from pleasures to the pains ending in death, the Son of God made Himself man, in order to defeat the death of the people. But Christ made Himself man into history, through a deed not submitted to pleasure, but He assumes the pains of the people which are consequent to pleasure, without which he couldn't reach to death, neither to defeat the death. If he had been born only as man into history, and not through an act above the birth out of pleasure, He wouldn't have defeated the death which, as consequence to the sin, it had become a necessary law. Namely, if that had been the case, it wouldn't have seen the purpose which He defeated the law of the birth out of pleasure for. Because, if He had been born in a natural mode, namely out of the pleasure consequent to the sin, he wouldn't have had the power of showing Himself as capable of defeating the definitive death, namely His embodiment as man would have been meaningless. And how could have been possible that the Son of God to be sinner? If that had been the case, He wouldn't have really defeated the natural laws consequent to the sin. But, if He had defeated the death without enduring the pains which lead the people to death, and neither would have been seen what the Son of Man has made Himself man into history, as preparation for the eternal life. All of these show Christ as giving the history a meaning, but also the elevation above the history's laws. It was necessary that the Son of God to be born into history and to live into history, but in order Him to resurrect, through the fact that he was born into history without Him having sin, and he willingly endured the pains and the death brought into history by the sin. Thus, the Son of God, by making Himself man into history, through His birth out of Virgin, He has given the history the meaning of a place, which the people are preparing themselves in, out of Christ's power, for eternity, by enduring the pains, and by reducing the pleasure as much as possible, namely only to give birth, into history, to the ones who endure the pains, and who do not consider the pains as an urge to search for pleasures." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 106-108)

"Only through the resurrection of Christ, which has become our resurrection too, the human life no longer remains locked up into history, for it is elevated from history to the eternal life. But, by this, the history doesn't lose its importance, for though history the man achieves the eternal life into happiness or into unhappiness, but this is only for Christ has resurrected and only for He gives the people too, the possibility to resurrect. Only through the resurrection of Christ the life into history has been filled up with meaning. This firstly happened into Christ. He advanced, through clean life and through sacrifice, into history, for others, or towards the consummate illumination of the humanity assumed by Him and, consequently, our humanity too, and we will reach the full light of our life, or the eternal duration of our life into happiness, by having faith in Him, and through a love for God and for people that to be capable of sacrifice, to the happy resurrection into the eternal union with Him. That's why Christ lived into history, He ended His people-loving historical life through His sacrifice on the cross, and by this, by defeating the death, He assured His disciples who lived into history too, about the reality of His resurrection, by showing Himself to them for a while, in a seen manner and into history, but without actually coming back to the life submitted to history. The fact that He has brought His humanity to the consummate light, it is shown by the Church in all its prayers, by uniting in its life the cross with the candle and with the calling upon the Holy Ghost. Everything is achieved from Christ through His Holy Ghost, and by looking at the cross with the intention of imitating it, and by looking at the candle lit for eternity by His resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 120-121)

“God imprinted into history the meaning of preparing us for waiting for Christ and for receiving Christ, in order to help us to prepare ourselves, within history, for the happy eternity. God has given all the things from history a meaning. Only the man can deprive the things from history of their meanings, when the man separates himself from God, by persisting into sin.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 156)

“The preoccupation with his future, through hope, it fills up the present time of the human being, so that he almost doesn’t live it like a present time. This is the tension towards future. Each present moment, it is in itself, but it is also through wait, a passing towards future, namely the first moment of the future, and an entrance of another chamber. The present is already future; a future put at our disposal and which we partially dispose on, immediately. But the present moment is a past too, when we direct our attention towards this actual moment. Through it, the human being is being prepared and he is being opened to a better future, which he hopes to be given with, and which fill him up with hope. But the human being is being prepared and opened to that future only through better deeds than his past deeds, as also by forgiving the ones who has upset him, and by asking God for forgiveness, for his own mistakes. The human being keeps this present moment also open towards past, by bringing the past on the present moment and, out of it, by taking help for a better future, which he waits for, with hope. The past will only be past and the better future will be opened to our hope, if we clean our being of the part’s mistakes, by regretting those mistakes. The past doesn’t master upon our being, as it would be a fatality. The animal isn’t aware of past, or of future. The animal isn’t aware of time, neither it has power upon time. The human being prepared his own future during the present time, by repairing the past’s traces and by liberating himself from an evil past. The human being can change his past on the present moments, by regretting what was evil in his past, and he can prepare, by this, the future he wants for himself and which he hopes be better. The past time doesn’t let unrepairable traces. The human being is master, partially, on the present moment, on all the three dimensions of the time. “He more rightly looks backwards towards the things to come”, says a poetry (the Romanian poetry entitled The Tree of Bread, in the volume The Place where You Wait, Bucharest, Cartea Românească, 1983, p. 21). But, the human being has them the more gathered together on the present moment, as through them is present the eternity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 136-137)

“If the future fills up our present moments with the waiting for a happiness in communion with our fellow humans, and in a full mode in communion with God, the past, with its mistakes, it is present as the one which can deprive us of this future happiness in the communion with God and with our fellow humans, but it can also help us through repentance and repair, in advancing towards the future happiness in communion. This burdening presence of the past is transparent to the ones whom we have wronged, even if they died. They appear to us as ones who haven’t totally disappeared from the connection with us, but they even continue to press upon us with a more persistent presence, as they could influence our life, eventually forever, either in bad, or in good if we repent for the evil we did to them. We care now about the fact that we weren’t grateful to the ones who helped us (parents, benefactors) and of not having fulfilled our duty of gratitude towards them. In our involuntary and voluntary memory about them, it glitters our future eternity, either evil, or good if we regret and repair our ingratitude.” (Stăniloae 1995: 137)

“The whole our past and future time, it is lived on each present moment as existential unit occupied with the presence of other persons and open to eternity. This is transparent both to the Person-Absolute, with the perspective of the eternal communion with Him, or with the perspective of Him turning away His face from us, and also on our fellow humans whom we wronged, there being the possibility that they to rebuke us forever, for the mistakes we did them, or they gladdening us with their forgiveness. On each present moment we can live by fearing a tormented eternity, but also by hoping for gaining the happy eternity if we repent for our mistakes and if we prepare thus for that eternal happiness. The past and the future are lived in present in an existential unit, not only amongst them, but also with the ones whom we knew and with God and, by that, with the eternity. The more the past is present, with the repentance for our mistakes done during our past, the more we are preoccupied with the eternal future. And the less is somebody preoccupied with his eschatological future, the less he thinks at his past and the less he repents. Such a human being locks himself up in the lived present, mostly consciously, and without having a horizon, like the animal is. Such a human being doesn’t gather the whole time in present, and he isn’t open to eternity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 137-138)

“Regretting our past won’t enough if we do not make of this regret a force for repairing deeds in the future and for the future, or if it doesn’t awaken within us - by remembering the ones whom we wronged, and by doing good deeds on their behalf – at least our reparatory sensitiveness towards them. By this, the repentance for our past helps us even more to change our whole past inscribed within our being, and to gain the future happy eternity; it becomes even more a preparing force for our good future. We have to mention here also the fact that the past must urge us to forgive the mistakes done to us by others, for they can no longer be present in this life, so that we ought to unburden them for their eternal life. This is because by keeping them under the burden of our lack of forgiveness for them, it can keep us too, in the present life and in eternity, under this burden, due to our conscience's callousness for them. The presence of the past and of the future in our present conscience, it is a presence of other within us, and forever, either towards our good or towards our bad. That depends on us. That can escape both us and them, from the time's fatality and it can open to all of us the happy eternity. But it also can keep us as its slaves. That's why, we cannot forget the persons whom we had a connection with, but we can change their and our face. Their persons can become favorable to us, and we can become favorable to them, in order to help us in our movement towards a future without mistakes, and towards repairing our past by doing good in this present life, and to advance, by that, towards the happy eternity. This is the signification of the time concentrated in present, through person, for persons. The time isn't a singular and indifferent chronological line, but it is an occasion of spiritual growth, an occasion of continuously transcending towards the communion with others and with the Holy Trinity. Through repentance, we transform the past from a determinant force towards identical evil, in a force towards the repairing good." (Stăniloae 1995: 138)

"We can advance towards the future life in the happy communion not only by regretting, but also by preparing ourselves for a better future. Otherwise, it would mean not to capitalize the past, starting from present, towards a better future. This is for, that capitalization, it needs us to immediately start doing the good deeds. BY that, we live, in a real, manner, on the present moment too, out of the power of the regretted past, and out of the power of hoping for the good future and for the happy eternity. Otherwise, we lock ourselves up, on the present moment, to the unrepaired past, for we don't repent and we don't do good deeds, and to the barren future, by getting accustomed to always postpone the changing of our past, and thus the betterment of our future. By that, we don't make of our time a unit and a force for advancing towards eternity, but we crumble out time in present moments, disconnected from one another, leading to nowhere, or which are connected only through the inferior impulses, which we do not master, and which keep us unwillingly in a lacking any horizon existence. By locking ourselves up in present, we do not repair our past and we do not prepare to ourselves the good future and the happy eternity, but we always remain to the movements towards the moment's pleasures, which dominate us, movements which we do not freely drive towards a good target. The present is fruitful in our regrets for our past, accompanied by immediate good deeds, which give power to the decision of continuing these deeds in the future too. Both the past and the future are efficient in present, through the regret of what was bad in the past, and through the assertiveness towards doing good deeds in the future, an assertiveness strengthened by the immediate good deed. This regret and this decision represent the efficient presence itself, of the past and of the future within the present moment, but also the power of the present moment upon the past and the future. Thus, we have the entire time bringing forth fruits on the present moment. If this doesn't take place, the present moments won't help us to advance, by repairing our past, towards a better future. In such a case the time passes as a chaining of empty and barren moments, not mastered by us, and lacking: unity, tension, and a target." (Stăniloae 1995: 139)

"Only through the immediate deed, the present is really and efficiently lived and, with this, we master upon our past and future. Otherwise, the thinking at our past and at our future, it will always remain a theory that doesn't change our time and our being. A Romanian saying asks us "to jump to the help" of the one in need. By that, our people realized the value of the immediate deed. Otherwise, one always postpones the doing of the good deeds, necessary for correcting his past and towards a better future. Through this postponing, the present moments always remain barren. So, it remains barren the entire time we have given with, and our being doesn't advance in time, powerfully, towards the good target of the happy eternity." (Stăniloae 1995: 139)

"Kierkegaard spoke about the importance of the moment, in order us to do what we are asked for, namely not to postpone, of using each moment in order us not to let the time we are given with to flow in a barren manner. But in this deep liability for each moment is involved the conscience that my fulfillment for eternity it depends on each moment. This is for on each moment is tied my responsibility for myself and for somebody else who may, as I do to, get lost in eternity because of my carelessness." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 33)

"The man is a being having an acute sense of the time's value, for he is a being preparing himself for eternity, in the temporal relations with others. The man's experiences are imprinted with his preoccupation with the eternity. The man's experiences are enriched, for accompanying the man in eternity, in his temporal relations with others. The man wants to always become new, for he wants to become consummate, to become all-comprising, and all-understanding, and he wants to help as many people as possible, who have been given by God, on a certain moment, in that man's care." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 33)

"The existence from ever it must be the plenitude, and even the plenitude in actualized form. This is for, no matter how far we will travel with our thought towards the eternity which the existence it has been given from, we never can reach a moment on which we could reckon that the existence by and large, it has reached to the required state for actualizing its potencies. There cannot be determined later moments for the apparition of what has been given by the existence from ever. If that had been the case, before any other moment, there could have existed other moments, for an apparition or for another. That's why, the eternal isn't identified to the temporal. Between them there is an ontological difference, but not a total estrangement. The eternal isn't submitted to the temporal. The temporal and the movement from its flowing, it has a different beginning in existence, than what is from ever. But by this, the temporal shows that it hasn't its existence by itself. And just by that, the temporal allows us to postulate the eternal existence, that is by itself. From here it comes that the existence from ever, it must be consummate, or it has to have the plenitude from ever, namely that actualized plenitude, because otherwise there should have had within a growth, that, the more one had gone himself backwards, the more he should have gone towards a more accentuated minus, reaching even to inexistence, and that's an impossible fact according to our faith." (Stăniloae 1995: 5)

"The difference between the eternal plan and the temporal plan of the existence, and the bringing to existence of the temporal plan by the eternal plan and not through emanation from the eternal plan, but through creation, in order the temporal plan to advance towards the union with the eternal plan, and by this towards consummation, or the healing of the insufficiencies which the temporal plan has fallen after the separation from the eternal plan, it is presented by Saint Maximos the Confessor, in a way that it unites the elevation of the plan of the non-consummate existence from this state, with its elevation from temporality and spatiality. This is because the temporality and the spatiality are tied to limitation, while the limitlessness of the existence is tied to eternity. The time, as a condition of the created existence, it is meant to bring the limited to the encounter with the unlimited, and the unlimited doesn't need time and movement, for it has in itself the plenitude of the existence. So, the time isn't meant to keep the universe in an endless movement. The time is a trip, but a trip without a target it would have been meaningless. But, by not using the time as a trip towards the eternal perfection, it has made out of time a continuous replacing of the identical forms or the creation, or a continuous apparition and corruption of theirs. The time is meant to confirm the persistence of the persons' identities within time, with the whole their enrichment with other experiences, but also to lead towards the persons' enriched establishment into eternity, but not to a stability in themselves, but around The One Who is by Himself infinite in existence, because the created world cannot reach, through itself, to an own plenary existence. This purpose has been regained, by time, after the falling into sin, for The Limitless God has assumed the created humanity." (Stăniloae 1995: 6)

“The plenary existence, though being moved towards something else, or around that something else, it still has within itself the power of attracting towards itself or around itself, namely in a temporal movement, or in a non-temporal movement and therefore a stabile one, the creatures, due to the fact that, on one hand, they are insufficient to themselves, and on the other hand they feel themselves attracted towards the plenary existence.” (Stăniloae 1995: 6)

“If there had been only an essence emanating, out of itself, individualities replacing one for another, meaninglessly and without a real fulfillment, there wouldn’t have been either a real difference between time and eternity. Everything would have been an eternal time, because it wouldn’t have led either to a real and really consummate target. Everything would have been an eternal temporality, an eternity not starting out of a plenitude and not leading to a plenitude, an eternity not having at its basis except an insufficient existence, and insufficiency that cannot be overcome, but it neither can be brought to inexistence. The time, in the Christian vision, it differs from eternity, but the time is produced by eternity and it leads to eternity, both the time and the eternity having a purpose; the time is voluntarily produced by eternity, for created persons who voluntarily advance through time towards eternity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 34)

“The God’s descend to the universe, which makes known God’s greatness, it is shown especially in God’s relation, with the universe as temporal universe. This is for in this it is shown a God’s participation to the universe’s temporality, and a connection of His with the changing universe, in order God to lead the universe, with the universe’s free collaboration – also only possible by God’s grace – at God’s height and to the eternal union with God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 36-37)

“The credits go to Mircea Eliade²⁵³, for he noticed that the naturalistic religions give importance to a nature that repeats itself, whilst the Old and the New Testaments pay attention mainly to the time and to the history. According to Eliade “the Christendom is the religion of the modern human being, and of the historical human being, of the human being who has discovered both the personal freedom and the continuous time (instead of the cyclical time)”, whilst “the human being of the archaic civilizations hardly endured the history and he strived to detach the history down in periods” (Le Mythe de L’éternel retour; archetypes de repetition, Paris, Galimard, 1949, p. 161, 36). In those religions “the time is regarded only biologically, without becoming historical” (quoted work, p. 74). “The main difference between the human being of the archaic communities and the human being of the modern communities, with an accentuated seal of the Judeo-Christendom, in consists of the fact that the first one feels himself as indissolubly connected to the cosmos, while the last one is tied only to history” (quoted work, p. XIII-XIV). The Jews are the first to discover the history as manifestation of God, so that “the cosmogony justifies the messianism and the apocalypse, and those ones set the bases for a philosophy of the history” (quoted work, p. 60.). The Christendom has made obvious the eschatology as the final time, a time that has appeared into Christ, and close to its end into eternity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 37-38)

²⁵³ Father Stăniloae quotes here the works of the great historian of the religions (he is actually the founder of the history of the religions): Mircea Eliade.

“Without insisting too much on the existence’s meaning implied by eschatology, Eliade connected the idea of time and of history to the idea of God as Person. But it is about a God-Person master upon nature and transcendent to nature and from here come the person’s value, a value that doesn’t melt within nature, but it is called to an eternal existence as person. The time and the history are necessary to this human being in order him to unimpededly advance during time and history, within nature, towards consummation, for he needs for his eternal happiness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 38)

“If we take in account that the time is a succession and as such it is characteristic to the changing existences, a time lasting from eternity and forever, but not leading the changing existence, by that, to their consummation, such a time won’t make any sense. If the universe had existed from eternity, no matter how eternal the universe’s time would have been, such a time wouldn’t have made the universe to overcome its changeability and insufficiencies. The universe’s evolution, even having at its disposal an eternal time, it wouldn’t have brought the universe out of what the universe is by its nature: the universe would have remained eternally changing, namely imperfect. This would have meant disregarding the meaning of the history and of the existence, which the mankind reached in the Old Testament, and more fully in the Christendom, and a relapsing in the archaic mentality of the naturalistic religions, copied by the pantheistic religions.” (Stăniloae 1995: 38)

“The universe hasn’t been given the time except as a passing interval, towards the universe’s preparation for universe’s consummation and unchangeability in the eternal life. But this universe’s placing in time, or the universe’s endowing with the change in order to become consummate, it implies the fact that the universe doesn’t come out of some fundamental essence, or out of some other essence, because if that had been the case, the universe couldn’t have been able to advance towards consummation; the universe has been created out of nothing, by a Creator-Person consummate from ever, and Who has seeded within universe the aspiration of advancing towards God, by being made consummate out of God’s power, or out of the ever-increasing communion with God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 38)

“This universe couldn’t have existed from eternity. This is for if the universe had existed from ever, it couldn’t have existed, from eternity, a universe aspiring, in time, towards a target – as the universe proves to be – or, until now, it would have reached that target of consummation. The universe must have appeared in time, and it must once end this form of the temporal, or changing existence. And for neither the universe’s apparition in time, nor its end in time, the universe couldn’t have given it by itself, and it won’t be able to given it from itself, these ones must come from the Existence-Person of supreme power and consummation, non-temporal, and unchanged. This is for the unchangeability in its positive meaning, it implies the existence’s limitless plenitude. The plenary being is unchanged not in an existence’s extreme poverty, but due to its plenitude, beyond which one cannot advance any longer, for that existence has within itself the whole plenitude and the whole rejoicing of that plenitude.” (Stăniloae 1995: 39)

“For understanding the time’s meaning relatedly to the universe, one must take in account that at the time’s origin and at the time’s end, there stays an eternal existence, and that the time depends, regarding its duration, on that eternal existence, and the time is a road towards that existence.” (Stăniloae 1995: 39)

“Questions we must answer are: What the time’s function consists of, as condition of the conscious creatures’ advancing towards the species consummation? What the created universe needs the time for? What can be defined like, more concretely, the report of the time with the eternity? The Christian faith has answered these questions by giving a time a positive function.” (Stăniloae 1995: 39)

“The time doesn’t have the eternal God only as its origin and target, but the Scripture sees God as working within time, as descending Himself to, and coworking with, the human being, within time. So, the history doesn’t belong only to the human being, but it is a work of God too. God takes account of time, He descends within time, He works together with the mankind within time; God places a historical seal, of His, upon the time.” (Stăniloae 1995: 40)

“Through works, God has created the universe and He accomplished within universe some promises of His. Without a doubt, those works and promises have a conformity to the godlike being, and God makes the universe, through those works and promises, increasingly resembling to the godlike being. But God does that by filling the universe up with His works, and not with His being. By that, and by the conscious coworking of the creation with God’s works, the creation ascends ever-closer to God, end even becomes a new creation, escaped from “sin” and from “law”. But that “new life” it is being lives, for a while, in the ambience of the present form of the universe, which the universe's old forms of existence continue too. This is the time when many grow up into Christ. The eschatological times has begun with Christ, but the new life is still moving in connection with the historical life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 41)

“All the modes which the time is understood in, they have in common the fact that they relate the time to the human being. If the universe hadn't had the human being within, the time would have been meaningless, or the universe's existence wouldn't have been real; itself the actual universe's existence would have been meaningless. This is because a meaning not noticed by a conscience, it will be a meaning covered in darkness. Even if that universe had developed from some forms to other forms, that development would have left the meaning covered in darkness, and many sides of the universe wouldn't have been brought out of their virtual state. The universe's meaning is mostly actualized by human being's work, and the universe's meaning is shown in benefit brought by universe to the people as conscious beings, for they advance with the help from the universe towards a purpose that is beyond universe, a purpose that is beyond the monotonous universe's repetition in its individuations submitted to death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 41)

“The changes from within universe, they must be beneficial to the human beings' spiritual growth. The universe has a meaning for it is of a limited temporality, and for the human being, tied to universe, it is likewise. The human being too, he is of a limited temporality, for the human being advances within time, and within the temporal universe, towards an ultimate target of the consummation, for the human being isn't spiritually motionless, or consummate, from the beginning. The human being's growth, within time, towards a target related to the accomplishing of some deeds within the temporal universe, for himself or for his fellow humans, on the right moments. The human being waits for those moments, he uses them or not, he let them escape or not, but in all cases the human being is determined by time. One must use the time positively, and the time can be used alike, for the time is limited. Thus, within human being, there is inscribed, through time, a trajectory and, in this trajectory one can see the human being's accomplishment, or the lack of accomplishment. The human being is in a continuous dialogue with his fellow humans, but also with God, a dialogue instigated and led within time, by the moments which the human being is presented with, by the universe.” (Stăniloae 1995: 41-42)

“The human being is temporal, and he lives the universe as temporal, for the human being is a conscious person and responsible for his fellow humans, and for himself, in front of God. God makes the human being to pay attention to the time, to the requirements of each instant. God accentuates the human being's character as temporal being. The human being is an historical creature and he makes as historical the life within universe, for God asks the human being to answer each instant according to that instance's requirements. The human being constantly pursuits goals, and he wants that, by accomplishing those goals, to reach a consummate self-accomplishment, for eternity. The history is the result of the agreements and disagreements amongst the various goals which the multitude of people and generation pursuit. Some people want to reach, through their deeds, their consummate eternity, while other people do not believe in that, so they pursuit other goals. And everybody's deeds influence everybody's time, namely the general history. But because of pursuing often contradictory goals, the history doesn't advance harmoniously towards that unique goal of the consummation but, the history still is inscribed on a road of a unitary advancing, towards an exhaustion of the human virtuality within time. That's why, either the universe reaches the target of a common consummation, or the universe, by and large, it renounces to follow that target, in both cases the universe will become, at a given moment, as inutile, for it will have weakened, at maximum, the mankind's collaboration with God Who uses the history in order to accomplish within history His plan of people's advancing towards Him, or towards the happy eternity." (Stăniloae 1995: 42)

"If the history's factors hadn't been the people as free and diverse persons, the time and the history wouldn't have existed, because everything would have proceeded uniformly, on the basis of an identical law, and God wouldn't have pursuit in history any purpose. The time and the history imply the freedom and the variousness of the human persons, who do not have their consummation since the beginning, but they aspire towards consummation, no matter how they understand that consummation. And for each person is unique, each person is let through his freedom, to accomplish on himself, in other time's circumstances, and in another mode, in his uniqueness. Each person reaches his own form in the possible closeness to his consummation, of the consummation of his features, or to the ever-crooked and impossible to be corrected again, form of his features. That's why each person has his own time, but his time is determined by the general time too, and his time determines the future time's form. The theory of the reincarnations, it annules the persons' uniqueness and the forms of the persons' accomplishing, and the uniqueness of the temporal moments for each person." (Stăniloae 1995: 42)

"God didn't introduce within Himself, when He created the universe and the time, a temporal "before", for He cogitated the universe and the time from "before ages". But God hasn't been forced to create the universe from before ages, for neither the cogitation of the universe and of the time, or of the diverse times form before ages, it wasn't a necessity to His being, but it was a deed of His will. The idea from before ages, of the universe and of the time, it wasn't a necessity, and that's why, the universe and the time, they didn't necessarily come out of Him, from eternity. We have here the mystery of the God's Person, as not forced to think at something, or to work something, with itself His being, so that Him to have, forcedly, in His being, a "before" to any thought and work, but only as having a base for those." (Stăniloae 1995: 45)

"The "eternity" implies a relation of God with the universe and with the time, from before the universe and the time existed, but without getting God out of the eternity characteristic exclusively to Him, or to His being." (Stăniloae 1995: 45)

"If God is able to pass from a work to another, after the creation of the universe, in the relation with the universe He has created, and that means that He has decided to have a permanent and eternal relation with the universe, and without this affecting His unchangeable plenitude, why wouldn't we accept also a thought relation with then still inexistent - in a real concretization - universe, in time, without this affecting the plenitude of God's eternity? And why God couldn't have had within Himself, from before the universe's creation, as possibilities, these works referring to the universe God knew He followed to create? God's things within universe, according to the diverse moments of the universe's temporal development, they are not contrary to universe's eternity, so that the times itself has a possibility to be brought to existence and upheld by God eternity and within God's eternity. God foresees and He makes to appear in the unveiling of the universe and of the human being's life, situations appropriate to certain accomplishments from His side, but not without people's collaboration. God gave certain promises to the people of Israel, and to the people by and large, when he reckons the people are sufficiently mature in order to receive those. God prepared His Son's coming within universe, and His Son came, actually, when that preparation came to completion. God has given as a gift, the human resurrection through His Son, when the people have been able to understand and to receive this resurrection. And the people are now able to prepare themselves, with the help of other works belonging to God's Son and to the Holy Ghost, for their own resurrection from the end of this universe's eon, for the future eternal life in communion with God. Thus, God lives our time, without our time inscribing changes and enrichments in the plenitude of God's being. This relation of God with the people's history, in order to answer the people's changing needs, but on the line of the good whose endless source God is, in order to help the people to increasingly advance into God's good, and, by that, the people to ascend into eternity, it shows a union of the people with God's eternity while the people still being in the course of their temporal life. God brings through His works united with our time, the eternity into people's life." (Stăniloae 1995: 46)

“God lives our history and He makes it as His own, but by filling it with His eternity, and by that, our history reaches to advance towards the eternity from above time of the people’s consummation, which no longer need to change, or which no longer need to unite with the time, or no longer needs to advance through time into eternity. But, in the same time with the living of our time, in order to elevate us, through time, and through His eternity connected to our time, towards the eternity lacking any union with the time, God live His interior pure eternity too, namely the eternity of His being. The mother lives the various needs of her child, related to the stages and to the circumstances of the child’s temporal life, in order her to answer those needs, and in order to help her child to grow up towards her spiritual level. But she lives, in the same time, her spiritual maturity, in order her to be able to help her child, out of that maturity, on the road of the child’s development. If the human being can live this intertwining of his maturity in an unchanged manner, with the changing of his works according to the time, we reckon that will be able to use this fact, in order to understand, to some extent, this intertwining at God too, once the human being is the image of God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 46-47)

“Only for the human being needs a spiritual growth in order to be united with God – or because the human being hasn’t been emanated in a consummation like that of God, neither in an impassable imperfection – only for that, the human being has the time with a meaning, or with a purpose. Otherwise, the time would have been meaningless or purposeless. And for the spiritual growth of each human being is connected to nature and to the human being’s fellow humans, the entire creation has been given a time. And each human being is brought to existence by God-the Word, in his own time, which the human being to be able to grow up as unique person in, in other relations, on another moment of the history, and connected to other persons, within another society, and prepared by other predecessors. All these personal times are framed in a time of the universe as whole, which each human being has his/her own place in, with his/her responsibility and duties, which are tied into a whole of the history, of which the human being will be held accountable for, regarding what was the extent the human being contributed to, to the history’s advancing into good or in the good understanding amongst people, or into bad, in the irrational division amongst people, namely, to what extent the human being contributed to leading the history towards its gathering into the Word’s Hypostasis, of the Hypostasis of the Hypostatical Rationality of God, or a contrary, after the Word of God has come to meet us and to help us, by making Himself man amongst people, or our dialogue partner on intimate and equal level, but also with His power to elevate us on the deified level imprinted by the humanity assumed by Him. God has created, on this purpose, the human being as possible partner of His, or in order God to come amongst people, and to elevate the people on the level deified by grace. God has created the whole material nature in connection with the human being, as capable of being borne by Him, as transfigured by Him, as made as environment transparent to His manifestation; but He creates the universe and the human being not due a necessity of His, but out of so great a love, for the creation, that He has made Himself as its bearer, and that he has made the creation as communicable environment of His.” (Stăniloae 1995: 56)

“The history, in its entirety, it is the time given for advancing in fulfilling this plan (the salvation’s plan, o. n.), but the consummation of this fulfilling it is being done beyond history, in the future age. The part from before this plan is propelled by Christ Who attracts it to the eschatological state – or that of the eternal consummation – to which he has brought our nature, namely to the full union with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 39-40)

“The salvation’s history it has now the purpose of giving the believers the occasion to become capable of full participation to the personal Absolute, together with Christ or into Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 40)

“The persons, though they are free, they do not have their existence, neither they have their unique virtuality, from themselves, because of being created. So, also the time and the unique circumstances given to their uniqueness and to their freedom and to their aspiration towards consummation, they are unique too. The time is the interval given to each person, between the beginning of his existence and his nigh end, for consummation or for eternal imperfection. Then the time will cease to exist, within the plenitude of the unchangeability, or in the impossibility of moving further towards plenitude, namely in the death as withering of the life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 42)

Transcendence

“The beautiful natural features of the things must be overcome by the believer’s conscience, even when there aren’t added to them overwhelming traits, in order the believer to be elevated to living the transcendence.” (Stăniloae 2005: 100)

“In the holiness manifested within world it is shown the same joining of transcendent and revealed of God, of height and of descent. If God hadn’t revealed Himself by still keeping something out of His transcendence in His descent, we wouldn’t have known this quality of His; if he hadn’t descent without ceasing to be transcendent, the world couldn’t have endured the holiness of God and it wouldn’t have been capable of being partaker to it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 266)

“This character of absolute transcendence of Jesus, it hasn’t been less experienced after He ascended to heaven, but even more intensively. On the other hand, through His ascent to heavens, Jesus has placed his Godhead in the state of communion with the people from everywhere. Everybody can stay in communion with God, differing from what one could have had, if He hadn’t embodied Himself. Jesus is close to the people through His humanity, but He is close to everybody through His Godhead which is united with His humanity. And He is not close only like an exterior person, but also like an inside reality through the infinity of his Godhead²⁵⁴.

But, like an interior reality too, He is something else than the product of our soul’s powers. He irradiates there, out of the objectivity of His Person. This reality in us, but different from us, due to which our power of the soul grows to a more ample and pure life, it is called pneumatological reality, unlike the spiritual reality, which is a product of our subjective efforts. The spiritual life is an internal life, not exclusively subjective, but of intimate relation between the own self and Jesus Christ through the Holy Ghost.

It is a life reported to the supreme our You, to the real transcendence, which fulfills us like existence.

Thereby, the embodiment of the Son of God it proves to be the full unveiling of God, like our fulfillment and salvation. The me-You report, in which God entered with us by the fact that He made Himself like one of us, showing through that that He is God and giving us all the gifts of His godlike friendship, it is the one of maximum approach and love.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁵⁴ E. BURGER, W. c.p. 227: “Der Glaubende soll sich nicht nur objektiv betrachtend, sondern subjektiv existieren zu Christus verhalten. Christus soll nicht nur gegenständliche Gegebenheit, sondern unendliche Wirklichkeit... Immer sieht die christliche Verkündigung ihre Aufgabe darin von der gegenständlichen Gegebenheit des geschichtlichen Jesus weiter zu führen zur Innerlichkeit und Unendlichkeit des lebendigen Christus“.

Transparency to God

“In the Church’s prayers, in the Church’s cult, it breathes the Church’s unitary ghost, it is transparent the Church’s eschatological horizon and its target of consummation in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 104)

“The light the saints irradiate out of them it is just this transparency of the communication with God and with their fellow humans, of the participation to God. The most transparent is God for he is the One Who communicated Himself the most. But this transparence of God it cannot be lived by the one who doesn’t open himself to the communication with God. The one who opens himself to God, he becomes a saint for he becomes transparent too. Generally, the people when they become transparent to one another through kindness, due to the communication with God, they become saints. And this is the truly human condition from Christian point of view. The evil makes the people to be not-transparent, darken, unopened, insincere, and hypocrites. The saint is therefore the new creation, or the renewed creation, and therefore a luminous creation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 273)

“God as Person, creator and care taker, He was showing Himself, with an uncontestable obviousness, in the untroubled mirror of the soul and all the man’s good intentions met the things previously suggested internally by God. The natural and the supra-natural didn’t form two distinct level - that of the life and that one of the reality -, but they were combined in a sole order of clear and good life in the same time. (...) In the state from the beginning the man was seeing in all things, as the saint sees, the gifts always given by God and the words always addressed by God through various circumstance produced by Him. The nature itself was a transparent environment of the work and of the actual speaking of God. Only when the sin blunted the clean sensitiveness the man had it for God Who works and speaks through things, there was necessary a Revelation which to differ from His of every moment’s work through things, but which is no longer seen by man. Before that, God was continuously walking through the transparent “garden” of the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 428-429)

“Through the loving and loved people, or through the holy people, one transcends easily to God, or: they are transparent to God in the most accentuated degree.” (Stăniloae 1995: 134)

“Gaining the people’s hearts, it cannot be done without making them feeling us as transparent to the kindness of God, kindness manifested through and by us; the others too, they can become transparent to God and active environments of God’s love towards us. Just in the act which we show ourselves through, as responsible for them to God, we make us too, to ourselves and to them, and we make them too, to themselves and to us, as transparent to God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 134)

“As we too become transparent to Christ, He is no longer an objective reality to us neither He is a subjective reality, but us and Him we are in a real unity, beyond objectivity and subjectivity. He is within us and we are inside Him, without being confounded; in the relation with Christ, we have surpassed the subjectivity: we are in Christ as in the most objective reality but also in the most subjective reality. This bodily transparency it means also a transparency of the soul and through both of them it is being accomplished the transparency of Christ as Person, a fact that means also a great sensitiveness and love of His. This makes us sensitive too, towards Him, and delicate amongst us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 74)

“Through resurrection, by the fact that His body is transparent, and irradiating love, Christ enters inside us. Christ Himself becomes our own together with His soul and with His godhead from within Him. And we, by becoming spiritualized, we have become His own, for we have opened ourselves to him by faith. (...) We answer Christ’s love with our love, through which we renounce to ourselves, as Christ has renounced to Himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 74)

Tropes

“As damaging the theology fixed in the formulas of the past is, as damaging is also the theology stuck exclusively to the present.” (Stăniloae 2003: 107) (Chiasm)

“Through the theology that is being done within the Church, the Church advances under the light of the “Sun of Righteousness”, which grows up continuously, and it fills the Church up with increasingly more luminous light. The continuous traveling under the same sun, which increases its showing though, it is the Churchly Tradition; and the authentic light of the sun that is being accumulates as dowry and as an asset permanently interpreted by the theological sight, it becomes the Churchly teaching. This light, out of which grows up the theology, and which is raised up by the theology by interpreting it under the always increasing sun of the Revelation, it enriches the Churchly Tradition and – by being imprinted as a transforming force in the being of the believers – it produces their spiritualization.” (Stăniloae 2003: 107) (Metaphor)

“The theology grows up under the sun of the Revelation that, once appeared in the person of Jesus Christ, it lightens continuously in the Church and in the Church’s members with this light called Tradition (...) The theology follows the trajectory of this sun and this sun’s growing up in the being of the Church as communion, and by doing this the theology increases the conscience of the Church itself and it presents the new nuances the Church’s conscience is being shown in, on each step and without being actually changed its background.” (Stăniloae 2003: 111) (Metaphor)

“God is the supra-luminous darkness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 137) (Metaphor, Paradox, Contraries, Hyperbole)

“Knowing God out of the concrete circumstances of the life, it is an exciting, burdensome, painful, and joyful knowledge, awakening in our being the responsibility, and which warms up our prayer and it makes our prayer even tighter to God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 137) (Enumeration of attributes, Contraries, Paradox)

“God, as hypostatic supra-essential existence, He is not framed in the category of the existence known or imagined by us, but He is above these. Because of all the things we know as existences, they have their existence from something else and they depend in their existence on a system of references. This indicates relativity or a weakness of the existences. But the One Who exists by Himself and Who has an existence free of whatever relativity, He is not framed in a system of references. He has no weakness. He is the existence not only on the superlative mode, but he is a supra-existent existence. As such, He does not endure the existence passively, and He is submitted to no passion and to no suffering.” (Stăniloae 2003: 156) (Rhetorical Catachresis)

“The simplicity of the divine monad Who also has in Himself a dynamism in report with the creation, being imprinted also within man, it sets the man free from all the diversity of movements and desires, or imposes over all the things, the movement and the desire towards God. By renouncing to direct his cogitation towards various finite objects - seen in themselves - the man concentrates the power of his spirit, even by those things, towards the One Who is above composition, in some kind of knowing above knowledge.” (Stăniloae 2003: 175) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Antanaclassesis)

“In this understanding we bring the whole simplified richness of the knowledge of the things’ multitude, and the experience of life, likewise the bee brings in the honey drop the pollen it gathered from all flowers.” (Stăniloae 2003: 175) (Comparison)

“Some people can go also on the opposite direction, towards an increasingly deeper internal tearing apart, towards a separation from god and from their fellow humans. The pride, the greediness, the anger, and the immeasurable lust, are the factors for this separation, and of the tearing apart in the human nature, and the impediments standing in the way of the open and full communicability amongst people. These factors also increase a false complexity of problems, of ideas, of tendencies within people and amongst people. It is a false complexity, because it actually moves in the same monotony of the passions, which manifest through it a lack of satiation at infinite, or a “infinity” of the finite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 177) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Hyperbole, Antanaclassesis)

“Often, interminable psychological analyses, which apparently notice also other states and the soul’s impulses those states cause, and other reports amongst people, these analyses only move within this infinite of the finite, of the essentially identical monotony, within a labyrinth of which infinite paths turn back in the same limitation, while giving birth to an increasingly complicated language, increasingly nuanced, and increasingly diverse; but this language I increasingly complicated and increasingly nuance, while still being in a finite blind alley, and not being there any light projected from beyond it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 177) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Hyperbole, Antanaclassesis)

“The man is incapable to leave the passion of the infinity even when he totally locks himself up in finite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 177) (Oxymoron)

“The eternity is the life and the life is movement; but it is not a, identical movement, in a circle, because this one is monotonous and finite as modality; neither is a movement of one towards and exterior another, but it is a movement above any movement (...)" (Stăniloae 2003: 177) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Hyperbole, Antanaclassis)

"Even when a person is absent from the space, we are used to see him, his absence is felt as a special absence, or the space is felt like amputated by that person's absence. That person is present even within his absence. In a way, that person continues to be present by the special energy of his subjectivity. But this presence is not a full one, and therefore it awakens even more the longing for his full presence. This "absent presence" it gives birth, very strongly, to the "longing" for fulfilling the place with the respective person. From here we can see that the space isn't for being by itself. The absence of any person from the space it makes the space somehow lacking life, dead. He doesn't contain the full sense in itself, or only for the isolated self. It is the ambience of a person, in the relation with me. It is made to be filled up with the plenitude of the communion, in order to be the context, the environment of the communion, the place for meeting and for interpersonal relation, the environment for reciprocal revealing, accomplishing its purpose through a transfiguration and overwhelming of itself by the interpersonal communion." (Stăniloae 2003: 211) (Oxymoron)

"God doesn't see these ones (the people who haven't done His will during their life on earth, o. n.) but only as created by Him, and not like the ones who persist before Him and who develop themselves within him, on the line of the being He has given it to them, according to an eternal rationality of theirs within Him. They got far from Him during their earthly life. God hasn't seen them persisting in Him. (...) But not being known by God it doesn't mean some sort of forgetfulness, or some sort of lack of preoccupation of God with them. God has forgotten the one who has forgotten Him, the one who hasn't persevered before Him, and who hasn't come increasingly closer to Him. God doesn't collect this one, forcedly, to His bosom, and He doesn't make him forcedly to love Him. By not forcedly making the one who doesn't want to love Him, to love Him, neither Him wants to see that creature in the accomplished state the love for Him would give it to that creature. But when the man starts to suffer because of this state, he starts again coming before God, to make himself seen by God, as one that walks on the way of union with God, and on the way of his accomplishing according to his rationality from within God. By shouting out, thus, towards God, God ceases to let him any longer in forgetfulness, and He sees him again neigh to Him, on the line on the increasingly tighter union with Him. The forgetfulness of God regarding this man ceases, or it becomes a forgetfulness of the man's previous mistakes, a forgetfulness of the forgetfulness about him." (Stăniloae 2003: 211) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Hyperbole, Antanaclassis)

“The holiness comes only from an absolute Person also for the fact that only in front of an absolute Person you can get ashamed in an absolute manner, and you can feel the urge towards an absolute purity or sincerity and transparence, due to the absolute power and therefore due to the absolute purity that Person welcomes you. In front of an impersonal “absolute” you cannot get ashamed; in front of a person who isn’t an absolute person, you cannot get trembling in the trembling absolute mode, as you are shaken in front of The Saint and all-loving One, or in front of a person through whom is transparent The One Saint, because a non-absolute person has, by himself, so many imperfections, so much reluctance in communication, which keep that person on your level. Only the forgiveness from the absolute Person gives you the total and definitive serenity of the conscience through the cleaning of the sins; and only through a person who speaks in the name of God and who confirms through his humbleness that only God speaks through him. Only an absolute as person can be clean through being and can welcoming you with the delicacy of the total purity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 211) (Rhetorical Catachresis)

“The saint always gives courage, by sometimes reducing the hallucinations produced by fears, by pride, by passions, through an equally delicate humor. The saint smiles, but he never laughs sarcastically; he is more serious, but he isn’t afraid. He values the humblest persons, by reckoning all of them as mysteries created by God and destined to the eternal communion with Him. The saint makes himself, through humbleness, almost unnoticeable, but he appears where there is needed a comforting, an encouragement, or a help. There is not invincible difficulty to him, for he firmly believes in the help from God he asks for in prayer. The saint is the most human and the humblest being and, in the same time, he is an unusual apparition, and amazing apparition, and he occasions to other the discovery of the natural human in him and in themselves. The saint is the closest and in the same time, unwillingly, he is the most imposing, namely the one who draws our attention the most. The saint becomes the most intimate to you of all people, the most understanding one, and you feel as comfortable as one can be, but in the same time he puts pressure on you by making you seeing your moral insufficiencies and your mistakes. The saint overwhelms you with the simple greatness of the purity and with the warmth of his kindness, and he makes you feel shame for your level lowered from the true humanity, and for your impurity, for your artificiality, for your superficiality, and for your duplicity, which are strongly highlighted by the comparison you are making it unwillingly between him and you. The saint doesn’t exercise any worldly force, he doesn’t give any command with severity, but you feel in him an unbent firmness in the convictions he has, in his life, in the advises he gives, so that his opinion about what you should do, though expressed with delicacy, or with a discrete gaze, it becomes a commandment to you and in order to fulfill that command you are capable of any effort and sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 2003: 279-280) (Portrait, Etopee)

“In the delicacy of the saint it is transparent the authority of God. In the same time, the recommendation the saint gives you, it gives you a power which liberates you from the helplessness you were in, from the lack of trust you have it within you, for you feel that power as a godlike power. You feel that the saint gives you light and power from the ultimate source of light and power, with a kindness out of the ultimate source of kindness Who wants to save you. You fear his gaze in your soul, in the same manner you fear the unveiling of the truth by a physician who is your friend and who is undoubtedly a very skillful physician, but you still wait for it like for the physician, for you know that the saint will give you in the same time with the diagnostic also the sure medicine for your salvation from an illness you felt it as being towards death. In his extreme delicacy, gentleness, and humbleness, you feel a helping power that no other power from the world can bend it down, a power that comes to him from God, from his total surrender to God, and out of his will of serving his fellow humans, out of the command and with the assignment from God, in order to save them. He who comes close to a saint he discovers in him the peak of the kindness, of the purity, and of the spiritual power, covered with the veil of the humbleness. You must strive yourself in order to discover the saint’s great ascetic deeds and of his love for people, but his height is imposed by the air of kindness and purity that surrounds him. The saint is the illustration of the greatness and of the power in kenosis.” (Stăniloae 2003: 280-281) (Portrait, Etopee)

“Out of the saint irradiates an imperturbable serenity and peace and, in the same time, he participates with tears to the others’ pain. The saint is rooted in the loving and enduring stability of the embodied god, and he rests in the eternity of the power and of the kindness of God, as says Saint Maximos the Confessor, being imprinted with the presence of God, as was Melchizedek. But the eternity of the saint’s steadfastness into the love for God and for people, it doesn’t exclude his participation to the people’s pains, like Christ doesn’t cease to bring His sacrifice for them, and neither the angels cease to continuously offer the people their assistance. This is because the persistence in the enduring and helping love it is also an eternity. This is the “resting”, or the stability, or the “Sabbath” the saints have entered in (Hebr. 3: 18; 4: 11), as one who got out from the passions’ Egypt, and not the Sabbath of insensitive Nirvana. This is because the eternity of the saint in the eternity of the steadfast love God has it, for people, it has the force of attracting other too, towards it, and to help them courageously overcoming their pain, and to not succumb in despair.” (Stăniloae 2003: 281-282) (Portrait, Etopee)

“The saint is a forerunner and a helper of the others on the road of the eschatological consummation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 282) (Portrait, Etopee)

“The saint has somehow overcome the time, being powerfully present into time. Through this the saint has gained a strong resemblance to God, by having God within him, with His steadfastness in good and in the love for people. The saint has reached in God also to the fullness of the human essence. The saint has reached the identity of the human essence with the existence, as Evdokimov says.” (Stăniloae 2003: 282) (Portrait, Etopee)

“The saint represents the purified human, through whose spiritual-bodily thinness it is transparent his model of infinite kindness and power Who is God. The saint is the absolute restored and the living and personal, a dizzying close peak and dizzying high or sublime, of the humanity, capable of complete open and uninterrupted dialogue with the Trinitarian communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 282) (Portrait, Etopee)

“The saint anticipates the horizons of the eternal, consummate humanity. Through everybody’s faces it is transparent the face of Christ as model of all the human faces. The saints reveal in themselves and make efficient the culminant humanity in Christ, as some hypostases of it. Even more: for the true humanity is the image of God, the saints reveal God in human form: the become-a-man God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 282) (Portrait, Etopee, Metaphor)

“One could concretize the continuity of the human nature, concretely subsistent in many hypostases, as a thread on which appear, one after another, the hypostases as diverse knots. Between them there isn’t a total void, but a thinning of the nature that appears thickened in the knots, or in the actualization of all its potentialities. Without the continuity between the human persons, through the thinned thread of the nature, it couldn’t be understood or maintained either its diverse concretizing in persons. But one cannot say that there first existed the thread and then the knots, or that the thinned thread between them it doesn’t belong to them in common. One cannot say either that the knots produce the thread between them. But both the thread and the knots, or some of the knots, they exist simultaneously. The knots communicate through the thread and they bring each other to existence. The knots can become increasingly interior to one another. In a way, each human hypostasis bears the whole nature accomplished in the hypostatical knots and in the thread uniting them. One cannot speak about human individuals properly, as totally isolate concretization of the human nature. Each hypostasis is ontologically connected to the others, and this is manifested in their necessity of being in a relation. Through this, they have a character of persons, and their true development consists in their development as persons, through the increasingly tighter communication amongst them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 303) (Metaphor)

“Each person is the center of endless rays, like a star; or the persons are connected through their rays as in a giant network. Through their rays they give and receive; thus, their rays are common, though the persons are different centers of the rays starting from them and coming to them. Each person is the center of so many actual threads as many persons are in relation with that person. And each person can be center towards any other person. This network is continuously developing out of itself, one part passing, another part being added, as in a sphere with increasingly numerous connections.” (Stăniloae 2003: 304) (Comparison, Metaphor)

“Like the drawing and the flexibility of the hand are of an endless complexity, but in them are reflected a drawing and a flexibility of the entire organism out of the work upon the world, likewise the face and the eyes express at their turn and in their specific manner the endlessly nuanced sensitiveness and expressivity the spirit has achieved in relation with the world. And for each individual represents in his body a own drawing of sensitiveness and expressivity, this one cannot be only an inheritance of the drawing and of the expressiveness of his parent and of the other ancestors, but it is from the beginning the manifestation of a factor superior to the nature and to the human species by and large. Into body is being actualized, partially since the beginning, partially gradually, the drawing of the personal soul.” (Stăniloae 2003: 399) (Comparison, Metaphor)

“Each person is inserted as a new eye of spiritual transparency on the nature’s fabric, through which the Embodied God works to deepening and to widening these transparencies, until its consummation through resurrection. The humans aren’t the simple repetition of some uniform individuals. The liberty the humans are called to, the contingent or constantly varied of the nature they do it in a continuous freedom, it imposes the irreducible originality of each man. Only thus the work of nature’s spiritualization it is being accomplished in an ample mode through other and other persons, various in their contribution, and through God Who varies His help to this work according to the specificity of each person and to the stage this work has reached.” (Stăniloae 2003: 404-405) (Metaphor)

“The maximal union with God, towards Whom we ascend through virtues, it cannot mean sinking in the ocean of an impersonal infinity. If that had been the case, the union couldn’t have meant any longer a human being deified by grace, but a sole and indistinct divinity. In this case, the final state of deification wouldn’t have been a state of maximum communion, neither would have been the road towards it an effort towards communion, which sharpens the sentiment of being a responsible partner in communion and which strengthens the freedom from the depersonalized and egocentric passions. In case of a sinking into the monotonous and dead ocean of the impersonal infinity, the man's road must have been a preparation towards reaching this final quenching of the personal conscience, by the gradual sinking in a self-deserted by all the relations, in the Platonic-Origenistic, or Nirvana's meaning, either by self-engaging in the dizzying swirl of the passions, in which the man forgets even about that self which exited the communion, or he reckons himself as being carried away by the tumultuous waves of a sea of common sensations, but outside the personal communion." (Stăniloae 2003: 417-418) (Metaphor)

"The people are actualizing their godlike image or their authentic humanity by advancing towards the knowledge of god and into the resemblance to Him, and by advancing in knowing the things' rationalities and by penetrating with them to the preexistent rationalities of God and to god Himself, as also through a living according to the symphony of these rationalities." (Stăniloae 2003: 426) (Metaphor)

"By not following to the commandment of mastering upon nature, the man has renounced his freedom. But the man renounced his freedom by the freedom itself, in a way that leaves the man the possibility to reconsider this renouncement, even partially, or to desire to reconsider it. If the man hadn't had the freedom to freely renounce his freedom, the man wouldn't have been asked to affirm his freedom by mastering upon nature. The basis of the entire greatness of man's godlike image it stays in the man's freedom. But in this freedom, it has been involved also the possibility of affirming his freedom by renouncing in the same time to his freedom and to continuously approving - through his renouncement - his renouncement to his freedom." (Stăniloae 2003: 431) (Paradox)

"The richness of the divine life and thinking it is reflected in a not-comprised ocean of spiritual lights, or of knowing subjects, and an analogy to this it cannot be offered us except by the multitude of human structures and of the ocean of particles and of celestial bodies of the material world." (Stăniloae 2003: 442) (Metaphor)

"The angels are bringing to us not only a new horizon of knowledge, one that escapes us from monotony, but they are also bringing us a help in developing our originality on the line of a beauty, and of cleanness and of a superior character. In a special manner, to the art creators, these new horizons of understanding and these new harmonies are opened to them in an original mode, fitted to them, through their angels. This is for the angels, by praising God 'with not-silent voices', they concretize in superior spiritual structures the bewilderment the divine infinite and indefinite cause to them. And these structures of harmonies and of understandings, though being immaterial, they still are noticeable by the ones endowed with a greater capacity of spiritual perceiving, and with a greater capacity of expressing required by these harmonies and understandings.” (Stăniloae 2003: 460) (Rhetorical Catachresis)

“The angels work, to the spiritualization of the creation, through believers. And if, in this sense, through the man is visible the angel, and through the angel from within man is visible God, we will understand how the angelic hierarchy doesn’t mean a separation of the man from God. The whole creation is in a focusing, in an internal catholicity, which implies a responsibility and a duty of serving each one for everybody, and of all ones for each one. That one falls off this catholicity, he falls in a shadow of the existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 465) (Metaphor)

“Neither the borderless and muddy pond of the libertinage leads us towards the ocean of love and of the freedom in God, nor the lake of a fix understanding the water of which moves inside some shores, but only the river that always flows further (upwards), but between banks ensuring the flowing.” (Stăniloae 2003: 519-520) (Metaphor)

“In the ocean of meanings of the Ghost from beyond the letter, one cannot row but only in a wandering way without the guidance of the same Ghost Who transmits their understanding within Church, from generation to generation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58) (Metaphor)

“Renouncing to the delimitation of each of the dogmas, or to their solitary delimitation, which aren’t either of them lacking movement, it will transform the limitless depths of their combined existence, in a lacking of significance puddle, in which everything is possible, but where nothing is truly new and profound.” (Stăniloae 2003: 97) (Metaphor)

“But in Christ – the Man Who is at the final end of the human, the universe itself has unveiled its whole meaning and destiny, as transparent to God. Christ is “the Light of the World”, a Light that lightens the world, the Light the world is lightened in. Each of us is, in certain way, a light of the world. But this quality is a mission too, which we cannot fully accomplish by ourselves. We see this mission fulfilled in Christ and through Christ we participate to this accomplishment too; Christ is the accomplishing of the man’s “real” being accomplishing as crown of the Creation – for in Christ the man is fully united with God. Thus, Christ is so “historical”, so not-built, and from this point of view Christ is the man’s most human image, but, in the same time, He is beyond the level our being can reach on, by our own power. That’s why Christ, the so real man, He is also God in His accomplishing as man. Said more precisely, Christ is the accomplished man for He is united with the man’s model, with the divine Logos. But in Jesus Christ, as embodied and resurrected Logos, and in the ones united with Him, the world will reach its consummation too, namely its purpose. Christ is the top man the creation is being accomplished in, for He is in a full communion with God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 15) (Metaphor)

“Within man as spiritual being, it is open to the creation the road of getting out of repetition, the road to freedom and to the continuous novelty, in dialogue with the Word. This is for only within the man whom the desired road is open in the intimacy of the communion with God, different from the plan of the creation, the novelty and the freedom do not move in the “novelty” of the infinite roads of a labyrinth closed in the immanence’s cave, but in the real infinity of always new meanings and of supra-natural love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 25) (Metaphor)

“Christ still hoped He will be saved, and He even knew that. For through darkness, it lightened like thunderbolts, His gaze like God, which brings back under control the sufferance of being deserted.” (Stăniloae 2006: 63) (Comparison)

“We, by bringing on ourselves sacrifice into Christ, or by renouncing to the egotism that limits us, we place ourselves in relation of consummate peace and love or in a relation of opening to God-the Father, we open ourselves through love to His loving infinity, like His embodied Son has done. Through this we are sanctified. And this takes place within Church, in the ambiance of the believers’ communion with the sacrificed Christ, and amongst themselves. And within Church we achieve into Christ the state of sacrifice or the state of His surrender towards the Father, the state of openness towards the One out of Who eternally start the waves of the endless life and love. The Father objectively opens the entrance to Him, to the loving relation with Him, but, at our turn, we must subjectively remove the impediments on the road of getting closer to God, impediments which close us to ourselves.” (Stăniloae 2006: 93) (Metaphor)

“Of course, the Church isn’t only a seen one. Without Christ and without His Holy Ghost there is no Church. Even the saints and the angels are in a connection with the Church and the seen Church cannot be imagined without them. Just because we believe in a seen Church, we believe in a real presence of the embodied Christ and of His Holy Ghost within Church. The unseen, within Church, it is only a side of the whole seen. But the seen in the Church is prolonged into unseen, the unseen penetrates, with its godhead, the seen. The seen is a sensitive image of the unseen, it is full of unseen. Properly-said, the seen is given a new signification in the light of the unseen. The seen becomes, to the eyes of the faith, a vessel of the unseen. And the unseen becomes somehow seen, through the seen part of the Church, for many things are shown within Church as transfigured (the body of the spiritual people). But even the things which aren't show as transfigured, we believe they are transfigured through the effects they have upon the believers (the sanctified water, the Eucharistic bread and wine etc.). That's why, within Church, being the seen transfigured, it is more than seen, but without being abolished as seen; on this way the objectivity from the Church too, it is a spiritual objectivity, and it is not as such only to our subjectivity. The spiritualization isn't reduced only to immanent causes. The Mysteries aren't purely seen acts, or acts given with imaginary powers only by our subjectivity, but within them there are godlike powers independent of us, either or not be they lived as such, by us and by our subjectivity. The godlike power from Christ stretches also in the seen elements of the cosmos the believer's life is relating to, in order to enter this life through them. The Mysteries, in their visible composition and in the visible acts they are done through, they are full of the work of God. But then, the doers of the Mysteries must be also chosen by God, through a destined by God and visible act, filled up with the power of God." (Stăniloae 2006: 105-106) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Contraries, attributing the adjectives the value of a nouns, and placing them in opposition to one another so that each one is highlighted)

"The body of Christ, full of holy Ghost, it is continuously coming within Church, and it comes in each limb as an always new wave of love, on the basis of the voluntary act of the believers to be imparted with Him. The believer's unity within Church it is maintained and it is continuously strengthened through this impartation. That's why the Eucharist, as common impartation, it has an especially great importance in maintaining and strengthening the unity of the Church. The Church is maintained as One, through the common impartation with Christ, but for Christ is within Church - through the common impartation and through the descent of the Holy Ghost ever since the Apostles -, the Holy Ghost comes, on one hand, from heavens, and on the other hand, He is within Church. Thus, only where the Church is there is the Eucharist too, and only where the Eucharist, is, there is the Church too. The Church until now, it has Christ, in its quality as communion which believes in Him, and which is continuously imparted with Him, like the community form the Apostles' times believed and it was imparted. "We have been called, so, to the impartation with the most-well scenting sacrifice, as a welcomed sanctified nation, as a holy nation, as an imperial priesthood" (I Pt. 2: 9) ... "For in Christ, there is no longer man and woman, but all of us belong to One, as ones who are imparted with the same bread" (Gal. 3: 28)." (Stăniloae 2006: 108) (Chiasm)

"In a certain way, the entire creation it is objectively frame in the rays of the same pre-incarnation Logos, namely in the Church's phase from before Christ, called to become the Church of Christ. Objectively and subjectively, the whole mankind of diverse beliefs, it knows in some measure the pre-incarnation Logos. And objectively and subjectively, the other Christian confessions know Christ, but not fully. By this, these confessions have partially achieved the quality as churches of Christ, being called to their fully accomplishing as Church of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111-112) (Rhetorical Catachresis: the compound word preîncarnațional doesn’t exist either in Romanian language; it was created by Father Professor Dumitru Stăniloae in order to express this new notion)

“Of course, distinguishing between the own functions of the limbs and their common work it is only a theoretical operation. In reality, each characteristic work of each limb it is performed by the entire organism and each limb accomplished through his function a function of the entire organism. Each limb is open to the work of the entire organism and it rejoices of this work. But no limb is confounded to the others, for each limb impropriates the work of the entire organism and the powers of the whole, in its own form. And right through that, the work of each limb is useful to the whole and it enriches the whole. Likewise, the same Ghost of the whole Christ, or the same whole Church it is efficient in the gift and in the work of each limb.” (Stăniloae 2006: 119) (Metaphor)

“All of us, we form only a “drop” in report with the God in Trinity; we are only a dew drop. But in this drop is being mirrored the entire godlike sun, and this drop is taken care of and it is beautified by this sun and it receives an untold value; and likewise, each of us who are part of this drop. If we live with the whole intensity of the existence the sunlight mirrored within us, we will receive this value in what we have us specific of ours. The godlike infinite as person, the great infinite, he has created in dependency on Him, some kind of “small infinite”, which He fills him up, with His whole shininess.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136) (Oxymoron, Metaphor)

“The light of the same ocean of the grace, an ocean of light and power, which irradiated out of Christ, it penetrates all the ones who receive the Mysteries, and the same Sun of Righteousness is present and active in this light and in the energy that penetrates the believers. Like a father looks at all his children with the same affection and he offers them the same love, likewise Christ penetrates with the energy of His love within all the ones who receive the Mysteries, by uniting them with Himself and with one another, and extending by this the Church and strengthening the Church’s unity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 16) (Metaphor, Comparison)

“Without the Ghost, there cannot be born especially the always original wonder of another man; The nature doesn’t give birth except to monotonous forms. On in Spirit there is the never repeated novelty. And the human spirit cannot be born without the contribution of the godlike Ghost, and neither can remain in his continuous novelty without the Ghost. Any human birth is an absolute novelty: out of a banal process of the matter, there comes out a face forever unique, as a flourishing of the eternity." (Stăniloae 1997: 24) (Metaphor)

"Being sunk in the water, at Baptism, the man encounters Christ in that water, or the man is en-hypostatized in Him, or the man is fully becoming a person being frame in His Person, and the man is being filled up with the energies of the Holy Ghost which irradiate out of Christ. It was necessary the Son of Man to sink Himself in the human nature and through the human nature into water, in order us, by being sunk in water, to sink ourselves in His godlike life, or in His Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1997: 26) (Chiasm)

"In front of God the man is a person and therefore the man is free. God know the man as person; but God know the man for the man has become His partner in a relation of steadfast faithfulness, for the man has committed himself to live a life of loving responsibility towards God. You remain steadfast in freedom (Gal. 5: 1). You have been called to freedom (Gal. 5: 13). Or: Jesus Christ has liberated me from the law of the sin and of the death (Rom. 8: 2), said Saint Apostle Paul, who always called himself, in the same time, servant of Christ, and who called the Christians as "of Christ" (Rom. 8: 1). The baptized ones are servants of the life in righteousness (Rom. 6: 18-19), which is kindness, it is live, and which cannot be exercised without a great effort towards liberation from under passions, which are the true chains of the man. This slavery is the free slavery, the slavery of an intense will to remain free, and to work according to the law of the freedom and of the not-betrayed love (Jas. 1: 25)." (Stăniloae 1997: 38) (Paradox, Oxymoron)

"If the man is called to a life of personal fight for maintaining and increasing the relation with Christ, for the man's strengthening as person free of the common passions of a fallen, callous nature, this doesn't mean that the man is called to a individualistic existence, which is at its turn a slavery of the free will, of the conceitedness. Another paradox is that just in the form of common existence in the callous nature's passions, there emerge the divergences which tear apart the human being; they tear the human being apart, in identical pieces which lack the true personal characters. A contrary, the form of personal existence it is a form of existence in communion, in which each man grows up in the originality of his own self-giving, on the measure he gives himself and according to the special gift he has received, or he makes himself totally available to others." (Stăniloae 1997: 38) (Paradox)

“The raising from death of the former man, of the one who is baptized, to the state of new man’s real life, in relation of personal responsibility to Christ, it is an elevation to the concrete activation of this responsibility in the reports with the other people and especially towards the community of the ones who constitute the Church, the Lord’s unitary body. Attaching oneself to Christ, it means becoming a limb of His in the Church’s body, it means being placed in the wall of the Lord’s dwelling place as a living stone, on the foundation of the Apostles, by having the same faith, the same living crossed through by the same Christ, so that all the believers to be inhabited by and in all of them to be seen the same Christ, though, through each believer, Christ shows Himself for that believer accomplishes a duty according to his gift. In a prayer at Baptism, the priest addresses himself to God by saying amongst other things: form your Christ into this one, who is going to be born again through my wretchedness, and build him up on the foundation of the Apostles and of Your Prophets (Ephes. 2: 20) and not crumble him down, but plant him as branch of shown truth, in Your Catholic and Apostolic Church and not pluck him off. Only by remaining within Church, the newly baptized one remains into Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 38-39) (To Orthodox, the Catholicism of the Church it means the universality of the Eucharist, and not the universality as geographical spreading, e.l.t.’s n.) (Stăniloae 1997: 38-39) (Metaphor)

“The union with the Lord in Eucharist, it is a full union quite because He is no longer working within us only through the energy brought within us by His Ghost, but he is now within us with His body and blood, imprinted in our body and blood. And where His body and blood are, their Subject Himself is fully present and working. So, the Subject Himself of Christ, as Subject of His body and blood becomes through Eucharist direct subject of our body and blood, which His body and blood are intimately united with, which have given by this their qualities to our body and blood, by being imprinted in them, and which have united their works and feeling with the works and the feeling of our body and blood. And for each one of us is subject of our body and soul and of the works penetrated by Christ’s body and works, we are together-subject with Christ of our body which has become His too, or of His body which has become ours too. Actually, the immortal life grows up within us out of the concrete and supreme intimacy we have entered, we remain, and we grow up within, through Eucharist, with the godlike Person of the Word, Who has accomplished the possibility of this intimacy with us and of the communication of His godlike life to our body, through the human body which He has assumed, filled up with this life through His real death, by overcoming the death the death He endured, through the state of mysterious death and of resurrection. Through this consummate intimacy and communication with Him, we live the states the works and the feelings of Christ, and he lives ours, penetrated and qualified by His ones. “From now on we no longer live, but Christ lives within me”, said Saint Apostle Paul (Gal. 3: 20). Actually, the full union between Christ and us, accomplished through Eucharist, it is the witness of His supreme love for us, and this is the basis of the mutual communication between Him and us.” (Stăniloae 1997: 60) (Anadiplosis, Anaphora)

“Through the Eucharist is being perpetuated the “memory” of the fact that Christ has embodied Himself, He has sacrificed Himself and he has resurrected. We have in the Eucharist the proof of this fact. But His “memory” is being perpetuated as a fact continued with us in a real manner. This memory means the remaining in union with us, of the embodied, sacrificed, and resurrected Christ. On this memory is tied also the memory of the Christ’s promise that He will remain, as The One embodied, crucified, and resurrected, in union with us. Through Eucharist we herald the Embodiment, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection of the Son of God as man, not only by their consequence as some past deeds, and not as a repeated reality, but as a reality prolonged, on an unseen plan, within us too. Saint Apostle Paul repeated the Lord’s commandment: “You do this for My remembrance”, more insistently than Luke – the Paul’s disciple – did, who surely took these words from Paul himself. This is for according to Saint Apostle Paul, Jesus uttered these words after offering the body and the blood, in order than to draw the conclusion: “For each time when you eat this bread and you drink this cup, to herald the Lord’s death, until His coming” (I Cor. 11: 28). But Saint Paul showed that the “heralding” in continuation by us, of the Lord’s death and Resurrection, by the fact that this living by us of the Lord’s death and Resurrection within us, it is the central theme of Paul’s preaching and epistles. The heralding of the Lord’s death and Resurrection become through Eucharist not the theoretical heralding of some past deeds, but it becomes the heralding of the experiencing some deeds which are being perpetuated within us.” (Stăniloae 1997: 64-65) (Anaphora)

“The Eucharist’s aspects of sacrifice and of Mystery, they are inseparable. Even as Sacrifice the Eucharist is a Mystery, for by giving ourselves to God we are elevated and we are imparted with His sanctification and blessing. And even the Mystery is a Sacrifice, for the Lord’s body, which we are given with, in its state of sacrificed and resurrected body, it which imprints within us the state of sacrifice through which we are Elevated and we Advance towards resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 70) (Chiasm)

“Christ has become by embodiment our fundamental Hypostasis. His sacrifice isn’t a sacrifice for Himself, but it is for us. But for this we must impropriate His sacrifice for us in order Him to impropriate our sacrifice in an actual mode, by bringing it to the Father as His sacrifice. The fragrance of His sacrifice becomes thus the fragrance of our sacrifice too, and the fragrance of our sacrifice becomes the fragrance of His sacrifice too.”

(Stăniloae 1997: 73) (Chiasm)

“From the beginning to the end, the Mystery of the Confession takes place between two persons who are in a relation of intimacy. And this relation is eased to the penitent by the fact that the priest presents to him as speaking in the name of the Lord, both with the forgiving love of God which helps him not to despair, and with the seriousness which stops the penitent from slighting his weaknesses. In the phase of the confession, the penitent unveils his secret to the priest as to no one else, and the priest knows exclusively the penitent’s secret. The penitent knows that the priest isn’t allowed to unveil his secret to anybody. Between them there is a secret also from this point of view. Therefore, between them there is accomplished a profound and intimate connection between souls, a totally special one. Only the priest really knows the penitent, for only to him the penitent confesses himself with the whole sincerity, knowing that the priest won’t ever laugh at his weaknesses, and he won’t ever divulge them and neither the priest will be surprised while listening to his gravest deviations. We could say that the two ones are connected through a unique friendship; their souls touch each other and vibrate with what they have the most intimate and serious within them. The penitent accomplishes with the priest the maximum communion one can accomplish with a man. This is a new motif due to which this Mystery is the Mystery of a communion like there is no other: it is the Mystery of reestablishing the full communion between a believer and the priest as seen organ of Christ, and as representative of the Church. That’s why this Mystery is that of bringing the penitent back to the communion with Christ and with the Church, by preparing the penitent for the communion with the body of Christ. No other man can fulfill the role of intermediary for the extended communion with other people and with God, except the priest in the Mystery of the Confession.” (Stăniloae 1997: 87-88) (Metaphor)

“Of course, there are unavoidable soul pains: the lack of honor, of attention, of gratitude from others. But these too, are pains denoting a weakness, which increase the egotistic sensitiveness, the superficial one, that one oriented towards world, of our nature, which, when overwhelmed by spirit, namely by our orientation towards the deep spiritual domain, it no longer vibrates so sensitively. The exaggerated vibration to the sensitive or egotistic pleasure of pain, it is the sign of a fitting of the nature to its external side, of the living almost exclusively on that side, of the forgetfulness about our nature’s spiritual side which is covered together with its horizon. The vibration to pain is the proof of a material callousness of the human nature, the proof of the human nature’s falling into the biological beings’ sensitiveness carried away by instincts. That’s why, the voluntary abstaining from pleasure and the voluntary enduring of pain, it means a victory of the will, as spiritual factor, upon the biological sensitiveness and, over all, an overwhelming of the biological through spiritual. The human nature becomes to itself and it becomes to others a transparent window towards the light of the own spirit, and to God, and that light is being poured through the window of the human nature towards the outside world. Being rejected the pleasure, there is no longer the muddy steam covering in a thick layer the human nature's window towards spirit, and by accepting the pain, this one cleans up and absorbs the mud on the human nature's windows." (Stăniloae 1992: 140) (Rhetorical Catachresis)

"The The humbleness means being aware of and living the supreme divine infinity and our own smallness. It means in the same time being aware of the fact that the divine infinity crosses through everything and through everybody from around us. That's why we said that the humbleness is a huge increase in knowledge. The humble man bends down before his fellow human as before God. While the pride covers to our eyes the infinite of the reality of God, the humbleness unveils it. That's why, no matter what we would do, as long as we lack the humbleness, as long as there is a trace of pride within us, we won't have the thrill of being in contact with God, neither are we aware of our depth in God nor we make others to feel that. Where the humbleness is absent, there is shallowness, there is platitude, there is a closed horizon, and there is the poor haughtiness making us smiling with mercy. In the undefined and full of mystery deeps, In God, and lives only the humble one. Salt (edifying meaning, seriousness) have only the humble one's deeds and attitudes. You must make yourselves totally small, until reckoning you as nothing, in order to see the greatness of God and to feel yourselves humbled by His work. The humbleness is the most widely comprising wisdom. The humble one, far from becoming spiritually poorer, he embraces from infinite more than anyone and he offers this to the other too. The proud one he comprises smoke. The humbleness is the valley of the rich crops sipping their power out of the infinite's sap. The pride is the barren rock battered by the nothing's blizzard, drying the life out. The humbleness is the supreme transparency of the human nature after banishing away the passion's clouds, a transparency penetrating every faculty of the soul. Through passions, which have as hidden engine the pride, the man is always placed before his own sight; he doesn't see the reality and the work of God, for it is covered by his own self. He is, to himself, mist and smoke. His passions are the sick concretions of his ego, impeding him seeing the reality. And these concretions do not obstruct only his ability to see the reality differing from him, but they obstruct also his possibility to really see himself. The swell of the ego, of the smoke emanated by the ego, it is placed between his sight and his real self, and he considers himself what he, in reality, isn't. The mind's getting outside itself, the ecstasy – in order to see God – don't they mean just this humble forgetting about the self when facing His overwhelming reality? This is for, in order to know something, you must forget about yourself since you aren't but an instrument of seeing, of receiving the infinite reality, or not even a self-standing instrument. You are a worker in a vine that doesn't belong to you, and also you are a worker only due to your Master benevolence." (Stăniloae 1992: 149-150) (Metaphor, Comparison, Hypotyposis)

"The disturbance is characteristic to the passionate, because his egotism gives him the sentiment that he is alone, justified only by his powers. But the one who knows that God takes care of everything, he no longer is submitted to disturbance and to worry. The dispassion, far from being opposite to love, it is dispassion just because is steadfastness in love. In fact, the big disturbances come upon us out of the suspicions or out of the news that others would harm us, that they would undermine us. It is hidden here the same choked awareness of the own loneliness and of the danger represented to me by the others' plots, given my loneliness. But the one who has deep trust in God he no longer fears the people, and so he has no reason not to love the people. The dispassion is lack of disturbance for upon it blows the breeze of the love and as it advances in this zone it becomes increasingly consolidated. The dispassion is lack of disturbance for it is full, like the love too, of divine power. The quietude of the dispassionate one grows up out of the conscience and out of experiencing the divine power penetrated in all his things. The strength of maintaining himself clean in everything, of living in the fullness of the virtues, and of not being disturbed by anything, he has it from Christ Who lives in him, "guiding him in all his words, deeds, and cogitations" (The Ladder, Step XXIX). (...) The dispassion takes us in the most inner place of the mind, within heart, where is Christ, and where don't hiss and aren't restless the passions' winds, but where are moving the serene and conquering breezes of the love." (Stăniloae 1992: 155-156) (Metaphor)

"Neither the subject of a human "you", who unveils himself to me in the love's ecstasy, I cannot comprise him in concepts. The knowledge of the ecstasy moments is superior to concepts, by being a direct and wider sight of what the indefinite subject is in comparison to the concepts which are like some tea spoons in comparison to a river or to a sea. That's why the experience of such a reality it resembles rather to a sight, to an ascertainment, to a union, for its character of direct and non-discursive contact with the reality of the untold and supreme Person. This is the reason why the Holy Fathers preponderantly call this knowledge as "sight", and what it is known as "light" it is something that can be directly seen, something that spread light by its presence. The clean prayer has brought my mind in the closeness of the divine subject, for in an instant the eros from above to kidnap me and to place me in ecstatic, unmediated contact with Him. This direct presence, or this experiencing of His unmediated presence it appears to me as light that fills up everything.” (Stăniloae 1992: 292-293) (Comparison)

“L. Binswanger speaks about the knowledge through love, which is an infinite knowledge of the entire “you”, and the defined knowledge of some parts of “you” that takes place when I want to define you and to subordinate you to my cogitation, when, by annulling the “ me-you” report, or the state of “us”, I leave the communion and the getting out of myself (the ecstasy), in order to enter back in myself and to draw you too in the sphere of my egotistic self, by transforming you in an object. The first one, by not knowing the reality of “something”, as object, it isn’t actually even knowledge, because of receiving a revealing of the fundamental personal reality in its quality as concealment and intimacy. It is actually a nescient knowledge. Only the second one is actually knowledge, for “the knowledge is only a knowing possession of something, as something” (Max Scheler). This type of knowledge, by wanting to possess the other one, it transforms him in an object. But his own subject escapes from under this will, and what remain in the hands of the one who wants to know him in a conceptually defined mode, there are only the veils, or only strips of veils, as in the happening between Joseph and Potiphar’s wife.” (Stăniloae 1992: 293) (Oxymoron)

“We do not speak about the Nordic Eastern. That one didn’t participate to laying down the dogmas and it hasn’t even absorbed the dogmas in its spiritual deeps as limpid and organizers of life grounds. The Nordic Eastern is the vast steppe where reigns the whistling, killer of life, of the irrational passions. What in West is the slow erosion, in the Nordic East it is savage, and momentarily, tearing apart.” (Stăniloae 2005: 50) (Metaphor, Epithets)

“It’s a great thing to a man to have a holy sight, penetrated by the awareness of the mysterious element in the visibility surrounding him. That is something else than the serious look, due to some worries or problems form this world. The Orthodoxy, by adopting the national languages as liturgical languages, it has sanctified the peoples’ words, by dressing them up in contents which stop the man from hearing them in a degraded manner. The Romanian people grew up honoring the visible sights of the icons, which drove them to create some visible imaginings take out from under the sin, and they have in their sight deep astonishments and fresh gentleness, and there are everywhere reflections of mystery, as somebody hardly can find at the unorthodox nations.” (Stăniloae 2005: 64-65) (Metaphor, Epithets)

“The Apostles looking at His eyes, they were seeing this supreme light, though in a kenotic form, accessible to them, the supreme form of human gentleness and understanding. The All-Clean Mother saw, at Her turn, in His eyes, with Her understanding and feeling as mother, the deep mystery of light from His eyes. They didn't see in this infinity from Christ's eyes a certain inexpressive force of the nature, but they saw full of sense Person's infinity, superior to nature. They saw in His eyes the ultimate cause of all the things, but also differing from all things, crosses by a deep loving intention of the Person. They saw in His eyes each thing in its ultimate origin, but in a conscious, intentional, spiritual deep, and not as in a still indefinite nature's force. They saw in the human eyes of Christ a sight that made proven the act of the supreme transcending of His towards his own infinity as Person, which just by that was transparent to His Mother and to His Apostles, without they being able to express it." (Stăniloae 2005: 225) (Portrait, Hypotyposis, Hyperbole, Etopee)

"Seeing the light is union, and the union with the light is sight. If accomplished when all the mental works cease, of course it will be accomplished through the Ghost. Being in light the one who sees, he looks at the light. Going out of all the other things, he wholly becomes light, and he becomes alike what he sees, or better said he is united with that in an unmixed manner, he being light and seeing light through light. By looking at himself, he sees light; by looking at what he gazes upon, he sees light; the power which he sees through, it is as well a light. This is the union, that all those are one, so that one can no longer distinguish the one who sees, from what he sees, and through what he sees, but only that everything is a light, differing from the created things.

To such a union neither the angels reach, except by surpassing on themselves, through the grace which they are given with." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 58) (Hypotyposis, Hyperbole, Anaphora)

"The method of Palamas consisted of commenting the patristic quotes. A very ingenious, subtle commentary, unveiling with an extraordinary capacity ideas and nuances, where a less perspicacious analyze doesn't find anything. But that was commentary, theology, which observed the Tradition's thesaurus. Nowhere did Palamas employ the scholasticism, or its formal limbs coming from the Aristotelian logics, or its definitions and dichotomies." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 153) (Etopee)

"The people aren't only receivers of the words communicated to them by the Father through His Son, or receivers of the gift of His presence, but they also answer those words by self-giving themselves to Him, towards His joy. This is for, by creating us as images of His Son, the Father created us, by this, as living images of the Word, or as some speaking words. That's why, through us, the Word Himself can speak to other people and He can give Himself as gift to others. And the Word speaks to us, the most clearly, after He has made Himself man. But, in the same time, He gives Himself as gift, on His level, and in human form, to the Father, on our behalf." (Stăniloae 1995: 114) (Rhetorical Catachresis, Metaphor, Hyperbole)

“The godlike Person is more than the infinity is. This is for the infinity belongs to the godlike Person, and not vice versa. The godlike Person manifests, as He wishes, the diverse forms of His infinity, and the infinity’s forms do not dispose on the godlike Person. The infinity of a sole Person would have been a vague infinity, and the forms which that infinity had been manifested in, would have borne the traits of a unique Person, the infinity of a second Person, though born out of the first Person, it opens to the first Person a new infinity and even unveils that infinity in a greater complexity. And in the communion of the Two Person with a Third Person, the infinity is unveiled even richer, in a consummate manner, and as a unique infinity of infinite variety. Even at people, I live my person as a great mystery, but I live my person as a greater mystery in union with the indefinite of my fellow human, and as an even greater mystery, in our union with a third person. This is an indefinite which I no longer dispose of, as I dispose of my own.” (Stăniloae 1995: 19) (Antanacsis)

“Several Occidental philosophers and theologians, they associated the creation of the universe to a diminution of God, in order Him to make to occur a void, which He to pull the universe out of. In the idea of a God’s kenosis, since the universe’s creation (affirmed by Serge Bulgakov too), there is something true. But, according to the Eastern Fathers that kenosis doesn’t consist of creating the universe out of nothing, but it consists of making the universe as limited, and of descending, forever, to a relation with the created universe. If God has created a borderless universe, that would have been an emanation from within Him, on the basis of an internal to Him law, and that would have submitted God to that law, by limiting Him in His power, and on the other hand it would have shown God as producing a universe which the life is always annulled in, by death. Actually, in God’s descent to a universe created as limited, it is shown, on one hand, an untold greatness of His love, as it is also shown His almightiness in creating the universe out of nothing. We ascertain here the following paradox: God shows, by creating the universe and by entering the relation with the universe, on one hand, His almightiness and the limitlessness of His shielding and comforting love, and on the other hand, He doesn’t pour in the universe the whole His power because that would have destroyed the universe. There is a power too, in shielding a drop of dew on a palm that could destroy it, or in holding in father’s loving arms, arms also overwhelming in power, the frail child, easy to be crushed. God isn’t limited by universe, as by something existing next to Him, for He comprises the universe in Himself, or He dwells within universe, but still infinitely exceeding the universe and wrapping the universe in His infinity, He wholly living on Himself, within universe and beyond universe, as source which it is given as much power out of, as the universe can receive – the conscious beings receiving more power, and amongst them, some of them receiving more than others – like the Father overpours within the understanding of his embraced child, as much understanding as the child can comprise, and increasingly more understanding, to the extent of the child's spiritual growth." (Stăniloae 1995: 35) (Metaphor)

"The person's spiritual unity, which reflects also the biological unity and it is reflected too, by the biological unity, it is shown in the fact that each person is a unique speaking word, having gathered in himself-herself all the words of his native language, and those words manifest in themselves the union with the cosmos and the virtual union with all the human being's fellow humans (...). A person cannot be separated from his words, and from the things that person expresses through his/her words, and from the fellow humans whom he/she expresses those words to. A person is, in the first place, the unity of his/her words; in his/her words the person changes and communicates himself/herself; the words are the human person's conscious and rational manifestation. But in the fact that the same words are used by other persons too, and that's why a person can understand those words for they belong to him/her too, or in the fact that each person needs to communicate the same thesaurus of words, it is shown the person's unity as a comprising whole, unconfounded to other persons who use the same words, in an incommunicable mode. The words do not exist by themselves. The words exist only when a person utters them and when another person hears those words. Only by expressing himself-herself in the inexhaustible communication of words, the human person expresses the universe too, which the human person lives within, and which conditions the human person's biological life and which gives the person's spiritual life a content, while non-confounded to others', but as connected to theirs and to the one belonging to the entire cosmos. Thus, through words, the human person shows himself as a non-confoundable whole, not only to other persons, but also to the cosmic nature. Each person shows himself as a rationality united with other persons in a common rationality that unites everybody's rationalities." (Stăniloae 1995: 48) (Metaphor)

"In the Holy Trinity, the being of God is lived by the Father as the supra-existential source of everything that can exist, as the plenitude, by excellence, of the existence. One cannot say about God except that God is the source started towards giving the whole His plenitude, as a gift. That's why God cannot be understood without the Son Whom the Father gives to, as gift, the whole supra-existent existence of His. The Son, by receiving it, he has a special motif to think at the Father with infinite gratitude, for the Father gives Him the infinite richness of His being. That's why, within the Son, the plenitude of the received existence is especially as luminous light. The Son is deepened, as supreme Rationality, in the infinite richness given Him, as gift, from eternity, and He gives Himself, for eternity, to the Father. The Father, at His turn, he looks at the infinite richness cogitated by the Son, and He is well pleased into His Son, and the Father looks at the Son with endless joyfulness. And this joy which the Father looks at His being given to the Son, and borne by the Son, a joy given by the Son too, for He receives it, He is the Holy Ghost Who is bearer too, of the Father's being. The son, by having within Himself the being revealed and illuminated within Himself, as given Him by the Father, as gift, He rejoices too, for receiving from the Father, with the joy the Father rejoices, namely together with the Holy Ghost. But the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost decide that the existence which they rejoice of, to produce joy to other conscious beings too, even if to an infinitely reduced extent. And thus the Holy Trinity bring the creation to existence, out of nothing, and the creation expresses in the various nature of the universe, but especially in the capacity of thinking and of constantly living the existence, which the created persons are endowed with, as shadow, the infinite richness of the being received from the Father, accompanied by living it as gift and as light, which it is lives by the Son with, and by the feeling of the joy lives by the Father and by the Son, in communion, with the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 50-51) (Synecdoche)

"The supra-natural acts done upon some things and forces of the nature (...), they make more obvious not only the words from the supra-natural Revelation, but also the words of God from nature." (Stăniloae 2003: 38) (Rhetorical Catachresis)

"The Church, the Tradition, and the Scripture, they are interwoven in a whole, and the work of the Ghost is the soul of this whole." (Stăniloae 2003: 67) (Metaphor)

"To Christendom there is a sole all-comprising truth that saves us: Jesus Christ-God-Man." (Stăniloae 2003: 72) (Rhetorical Catachresis)

"The Church in its entirety, it accomplishes through the Holy Ghost, a symphonic inter-conditioning of the individual thoughts." (Stăniloae 2003: 102) (Metaphor)

"In this way, the death accomplishes a double meaning in report with a world affected by sin. First, it shows that through the two forms of existence of the souls, after the separation from the body, that not to the body it is due in the final analyze the hindering and the deformation of the life of the spirit, but it is due to the sin. Secondly, the death dissolves a body which, even when it is no longer an environment for the manifestation of the sin, it cannot be transformed in a such a great measure than to not narrow anymore the life of the spirit, no matter how much it would shrink this deficiency during the earthly existence - that of some saints, for instance. The historic body, if it is not the environment of manifestation for a present sin, it still bears in its structure the thickenings produced by the past sin, or by its continuity with the corporality of a sinful mankind and of a cosmic nature adapted at such a corporality. That is the cooled lava, showing that the fire of the sin passed through that soul. The historical body cannot be modified in the frame of this world, but it must be destroyed to the ground and it must be entirely removed out of the continuity which it is in, with this form of the world.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Troubles

“The most beautiful apothegms on the purpose of the troubles have been left to us by Mark the Ascetic and Isaac the Syrian; they are a real theology about troubles. In the first place, through troubles God attracts us away from sins. Secondly, the troubles will often follow to the sins, even if we have confessed the sins. Through troubles is restored the distorted human nature and it is strengthened again. There is a regulated compensation between the willingly accepted sin and the unwillingly coming trouble. Thirdly, the troubles are sent to us in order us to be tested, in order out human nature to be strengthened, and in order us to avoid future mistakes. In the fourth place, the troubles can come upon us even when we haven’t committed any sin: for the sins committed by others. And the fifth thing one must notice, it is that being patient in troubles it is a sign of power and of wisdom and it endows us with power and wisdom.” (Stăniloae 1992: 141)

“By and large, the troubles are a necessary part of the salvation’s oikonomia, and the one who accept them will be spared of eternal torments. There is an alternance between joys and troubles in this world. Just the things that had brought you joys, later it will bring you troubles, and vice-versa.” (Stăniloae 1992: 141-142)

“A wise order guides the destiny of each of us. The joy can make us paying less attention to our duties, and therefore it must be spread upon with a cold shower of troubles, in order us to not weaken our efforts. But the troubles mustn’t last for too long, in order the doubt not to nest within us the regarding that there is somebody taking care of us. From the joy’s hills to the valleys of the troubles, so it passes the spiritual man’s life; but this life records a real progress in this alternance. The joys for having patience are ever cleaner, ever more spiritualized, and ever more not-stained by the self-appreciation; the troubles are ever more steadfastly endured. Properly-said, the joys are appeased by the uncertainty regarding the troubles to come, and the troubles are endured with a mix of serenity, and with internal laughter as Saint John Climacus said, for the certitude of the joys coming soon. So, no matter how changing are the external circumstances which the life of the spiritual man is being unfolded in, inwardly his life has reaches some kind of leveling, which gives him a steadfast quietude. This is the strength of the spirit facing the world’s waves.” (Stăniloae 1992: 142)

“If in the rush for pleasures and in the fleeing away from pains there is manifested the fickleness and the slippery character of our nature, those ones being consequence of the sins and the sign of the corruption from within our nature, in our nature’s steadfastness and non-changeability manifested in restraint and patience are shown the firmness and the earnest of the incorruptibility, which have been achieved according to the example of the Christ’s human nature and by His help. Therefore, our nature needs patience exercises, so that the troubles occasioning these exercises either they are consequence of some sins or not. And the world being ordered thus, in order not to be to us only revelation of the godlike providence, of the Giver of good, but also in order to be revelation of the Judge, namely of the One Who wants to strengthen us, through a harsher pedagogy, from time to time. Our human nature asks itself for this harshness, in order not to become lazy; it asks for it until getting fully strengthened in the future life. It doesn't ask for that, permanently, because of not being able to endure it, but only in alternation with the affection signs. God uses the world and the time as grace and judgment for us. Under both aspects this is useful to us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 142-143)

Truth

“Christ is, through this, namely by the fact that He is the supreme Person Himself irradiating the whole power and life, He is a dynamic truth, in the sense that in quality as God He gives His humanity the power to be filled up by Him like God, or to be filled up with His life, and in the sense that this humanity is being stimulated to grow up in its truth, through the effluvia irradiated from God and which respond to the most natural needs. This is because of the fact that in Him it is the origin of His humanity. This truth as life, it is being communicated through the humanity of Christ, to other people too, and these ones are being stimulated at their turn to grow up in Him, to become like Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 52)

“The dynamic quality of the “truth” it doesn’t mean that the truth’s supreme essence is being continuously produced. The “truth” is from ever, and forever and ever, in the same essence. But Christ promotes the man, as “image” of His, in eternity, by configuring the man, out of His infinity, increasingly more according to Him, as Model. Advancing in truth is the advancing towards an increasingly deeper imprinting of the man with the humanity of Christ as the man’s model, for Christ has the power to lead the man to an infinite consummation, for Christ’s humanity itself is imprinted and filled up with His Godhead. But this is being accomplished by the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 52)

“The savior truth has been firstly accomplished in the humanity of Christ, already through the implications of the hypostatical union, by making the humanity of Christ fully according to its godlike model. The teaching of Christ is one of the forms the Person of Christ communicated Himself to the other people, through His human nature, in order to save them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

“For Christ as God and true man He is not getting outdated, His work and His teaching aren’t getting outdated either. But describing His infinite Person through His godhead and always actual in His humanity accomplished in a supreme mode, this description so, it must be done on the level of understanding of each time, in order to make obvious His unique truth, in the whole plenitude of this truth.” (Stăniloae 1997: 112)

“In the first place, there is a truth or an objective meaning regarding everything. This is what the term “rationality” (λογος) – used by Saint Maximos the Confessor, and by other Church Fathers - wants to say. The truth or the meaning it isn’t a subjective product, really varying from a individual to another individual. Each thing has, objectively, an own meaning, as also a purpose, a cause, a finality, and a special connection with the other things. Our judgment on this truth or meaning it can vary according to our interests, according to preconceived ideas, and according to our intellectual capacity and education. But this doesn't modify the truth too, or the meaning of a thing, which remains untouched in itself, waiting for being discovered. Likewise, any deed must have "rationality" and only then it is objectively rational when it conforms to that rationality. If, due to diverse interests, we do not fit the deed to the rationality which our deed is called to serve to, we will vainly try to endow our deed with other "rationality" – our deed will remain irrational." (Stăniloae 1992: 170)

"Everything God has done it takes place and it is committed according to His will - namely on the line of the true development of the Creation, in totality, or of each creature individually - it is rational, said Saint Maximos the Confessor. Only the passion is irrational, though it tries to give to itself a rational justification. The rational character of this truth or meaning, it stays not only in the unchanged objectivity, harmonically interwoven within the whole reality, but also in the power which it imposes itself with, once it has reached the purification of passions. Then God glimmers out of each thing, in the doorstep of each deed, from the first moment. In this sense the discursive cogitation becomes no longer necessary in order to detach that truth and to impose it. It is in a way its intuitive glimmer. But this truth glimmers like overwhelming rationality, as logos objectively understood by us, but also above our understanding, imposing itself through its fully convincing and obvious rationality and, in the same time, through its supra-rationality as a reflection of a harmonious and immovable of existence order, of a thing or of deeds within the entire reality." (Stăniloae 1992: 170)

"Only the objective rationalities are those serving the general development, and are those which the things tend towards in their harmonious development. The one replacing the objective rationalities for subjective rationalities he put the general in the service of the individual, and thus he impedes the normal development of the whole. The objective and general truth is replaced for a truth belonging to an individual. Thus, because of each individual placing a "truth" of himself instead of the objective and general truth, the world no longer appears as the same to everybody, but each individual sees the world differently, so that no one knows anymore which world is the real one. This gives birth to the doubt that actually there is no longer a truth and that everything is an illusion. Actually, all the opinions give on this way as truth, they are only illusions. The objective truth still exists, but it is beyond the interested judgment of everybody." (Stăniloae 1992: 171-172)

"The appearance of truth of the subjective opinions it is explained by the fact that they are the refractions of the unique truth, in the crooked by passions receptacles, which are the diverse individuals.” (Stăniloae 1992: 172)

“According to the Eastern Fathers the truth isn’t subjectivity, as said Sören Kirkegaard, but it is the most objective reality. In order to find the truth, one must, a contrary, to overcome any subjectivity. Of course, one cannot find out the truth on a purely theoretical way, through rationality detached from the integral living of a concrete person. Such a detaching it is impossible. Rationality in itself, uniform to all people, it is impossible too. The passions made the rationality slippery. And on the removal of the passions, the rationality advanced differently, depending on each person, in knowing the objective truth. From this point of view, the knowledge depends too on a “subjective” state of the rationality. But the truest subjectivity it is that according to the truth’s “objectivity”. Within the man who hasn’t purified himself of passions yet, the rationality is always in the service of the passions and its reasoning crook up the truth. This sinful “subjectivity” is the one that must be overcome. But one doesn’t overcome the “subjective” rationality only by not listening to it in the moments of cogitation. The man cannot live split in half. Even if for a while, a part of him, namely his affectivity and his complex of interests seem to be asleep, these ones still influence the rationality’s reasoning. The man must be unified. This subjectivity falsifying the truth, it cannot be defeated except through a battle which all the man’s powers are engaged in, and not only the rationality, in order to obtain the total victory upon the passionate subjectivity. One must replace the passions for virtues.” (Stăniloae 1992: 173)

“Only a rationality shaped according to a virtuous life, namely after a life that has sacrificed, through a long exercise, the egotism and the pride of the own point of view, it can come close to the truth. This can be called as subjectivity too, but only in a precise sense: as struggle of the whole man against his egotistic subjectivity, as struggle in order to reach the forgetting about the self and to experience this forgetting about the self. Only the subjectivity which means the living of the overcoming of the own subjectivity, it is able to come close to the truth. That’s why it is just what Kirkegaard says that the truth is the evidence which you are ready to yield your life for; but this sacrifice capacity means forgetting about the self. Who has come close to the truth he has succeeded that for through a long exercise he has succeeded to forget about himself, to get out of himself, and once he has found the truth, the truth makes him forgetting about himself ever more. But this state is an integral feeling. Here isn’t only the rationality that has forgotten about the side of the subjectivity, but here is the whole man forgetting about himself. And this doesn’t mean only something negative, but it means something positive too: the whole man is in love with the truth, he is stretching towards the truth, he is happy for defeating on himself, and he is happy to live and to die for the truth. In this sense we can speak too about a finding out and about an existential living of the truth. But the rationality isn't removed from its function, while still isn't a cold rationality, but a rationality assisted by all the soul's powers. The rationality feels free for it has the evidence that it serves the truth, which is really conform to it, and not to an appearance of truth, stranger to it, and non-conform to it. The truth keeps the rationality conquered – as on the whole man too – and the truth has set the rationality itself free, and the whole man is on a superior level, identified to the truth, and transformed, namely elevated on a superior level of his being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 173-174)

“This getting out of the self in objectivity in order to find out the truth and in order to live the truth as something conform to the most characteristic subjectivity, or better said this integral identification of the self to the objective logos, It means, in the same time, the getting out of isolation and entering the universal, in the relation with the Person Who comprises everything. As we know more fully the truth, we leave our private opinions which are contrary, and we start thinking the same. We reach the union in thought, and this has as consequence the union in will and feeling too. This is the restoration of the human being which has been torn apart by sin. This is accomplished through the one truth Who is the supreme Person, Whom the restoration of the human being is conform to, for the truth is God and we are made conform to God. Where God is known Who is everything as Person, there it is accomplished the communion, namely the Church. The truth cannot be known and confessed except “with one mind and with one heart”.” (Stăniloae 1992: 174)

“The stage of the coming back to the road of the truth and to its increasingly clearer light, are the followings:

1) An initial faith, as will of explaining all the things through their rationalities, rationalities which have they roots in God as Person, or as a supreme communion of Persons and of fulfilling on any moment the commandment given by God, even if we do not have yet an experienced and satisfactory evidence of the connection of the things' rationalities with God or of the motives which we must fulfill His commandments for. This is for now a global faith about the presence of God as Person in everything, and Who make us only generally to realize that we are into truth and that we go on that road towards increasingly understanding Him.

2) A long perseverance in guiding the life and in explaining the things from within world in the light of the faith. These two are in tight connection. This is for guiding the life according to the Lord's commandments on the basis of the faith it means purifying of passions and regaining the virtues, namely the getting out of our narrowness and the conformation of our being to God, through relation with Him. This isn't else but renouncing to considering the things as simple objects for egotistical satisfaction, and regarding the things as rays of the divine glory, love, and almightiness. During the whole this time I do on the basis of the faith some value judgment upon the deeds which I must commit and explanative judgments upon the true rationalities or purposes of the things, related to God. Persevering through deeds in such an effort it accustoms me to these judgments. For instance, I am getting accustomed no longer considering an apple, when I see it, as an attractive material substance for my lust, but rather as a sign of the divine kindness and beauty, and I find out the rationality of any deed in a commandment of God Who wants me to answer His love and to conforming myself in my deeds to Him, as any deed that doesn't conform to this commandment I regard it as irrational.

3) The life experience achieved through the mentioned perseverance it will confirm me my value judgments after I have accustomed myself to do these judgments upon the deeds, and it confirm me also the explanation of the things' rationalities as having their foundation in God. The experiences show me that actually the things' surface beauty and sweetness it is perishable, that a live directed only towards bodily and egotistical satisfactions searched in these superficial beauties and sweetness, it loses through the body's withering its support which we have placed the whole our trust in. So, what actually remains out of the beautiful objects it is the revelation of a beauty that is independent from its material incorporations, as the man after the weakening of his body he remains with a being that has reached the cleanness. Thus, the judgments upheld in the beginning by faith, crossing through the experience of a virtuous life, they start being illuminated by interior evidence. Until the faith isn't prolonged in fulfilling the commandments "it has in itself the rationality of the truth" (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Qauest. ad Thalass., q. 54), but yet not illuminated, yet not made obvious.

In order to reach the evidence of the truth implied in faith, or the evidence of the judgments we made on the faith's basis, we must exercise a lot in the virtuous life. This clean evidence is that called as discernment. The fact that the discernment stays, on one hand, in connection with the understanding of the rationalities from within things, appearing in the same time and developing in a parallel manner, but on the other hand it gives birth to this knowledge of the rationalities and not inversely, it might justify Saint Maximos the Confessor to place the discernment here on a parallel level, and there on a level previous to knowing the rationalities from within things. But we realize that the discernment is founded on wider evidence than that one that we can comprise in our judgment or in our concept. This is for we realize that the rationality itself of a commandment or the rationality of a thing, it cannot be integrally and exactly caught in a judgment of ours, and even lesser the rationality or the meaning of a person. Thus, we always tend towards concepts more adequate to that evidence, though immediately that we reach a more comprising concept, or a more nuanced judgment, the evidence has become even larger, more profound. Since the phase of the simple faith and of the judgment uttered on its basis, without explicit evidence, there existed at least the evidence that in things and in commandments there are godlike rationalities and utterances which we cannot perceive, so that the faith's indications are right. Since then, beside the judgments there has been evidence which those judgments haven't been able to comprise it. In this infinite virtuality it is manifested the presence within world of the divine intentional energies. The rationalities from within things aren't else but the rationalities of God, projected in the things' mirror by the divine intentional energies. From the rationalities imperfectly mirrored in things are open to us new perspectives of ascending on the thread of the divine energies to the rationalities from within God. But we won't ever be able to confine these in concepts. The evidence it cannot be therefore ever comprised within the concepts' and of the rational judgment' margins, on one hand because it isn't yet enough clear, and on the other hand because it is virtually infinite and we feel on every moment its borderless character.

The discernment as noticing of the rationalities from within commandments and from within the deeds we must to commit, it becomes increasingly clearer, and the knowledge directed towards things it penetrates towards their increasingly spiritual rationalities. Deeds which are apparently good, through discernment - or through the right reckoning as it is called by monks - are unveiled as lacking this quality. Rationalities which seemed before a ultimate, they indicate towards new progresses to be made in the virtuous life, towards even deeper rationalities. Through exercise, it is being continuously sharpened the power of noticing the things' meanings, the intentions God has though things, and the consequences of our deeds upon us and upon our fellow humans.

4) But this increased nimbleness it has as effect also an acceleration of noticing the rationalities from deeds and from things, insomuch than, after a long exercise, it is unveiled from the first glance what is bad even in an apparently good deed, or in the deeper rationality of a thing. Through the long habituation of discerning the real good deeds from the deeds which are only apparently good, immediately that one asks for our advice for a certain deed, or immediately that a thought urges me to commit that deed, I notice the deed's quality. And by the long habituation to considering that the things' rationalities do not consist of their simply bodily use, but it consists of revealing a spiritual meaning, of a divine intention, immediately that I see a new thing, I notice beyond that thing, beyond its bodily useful surface, its spiritual meaning, the divine feature which that things indicate towards, the divine will and relation wanted to be accomplished through that thing with me, my spiritual enrichment or my impoverishment intended through that thing.

This is the lightening "intuition" of the things' essences and of the deeds' values. As one can see it doesn't appear out of the blue sky and it isn't something irrational, but it is the result of a long exercising of the rationality guided by faith and upheld by persevering into the virtuous life. If we reserve the name of contemplation used by Saint Maximos the Confessor, on the basis of this nimble sight and of this rapid noticing, let's not forget though that it appears at the end of the long effort of purification of passions, of achieving the virtues, when we truly will be able to look the things as "simple ideas" and in the same time deep, namely in the spiritual rationalities unaffected by our passion. We "see" God through these rationalities also in the sense that the long habituation to bringing everything in connection with God it helps us not to do this operation in a flashing manner, by seeing from the first perceiving of a quality divine features which have accomplished that, the purpose which we have been given with it, as sign of His love in order to incite our love, in order to be accomplished between us, God, and our fellow humans, a dialogue of the reciprocal self-giving out of love. But as I said before, in this rapid noticing too, there is larger evidence than the one we can comprise in concept. As lightening we bring a thing's beauty in connection with God on the basis of habituation, as lightening we realize that the divine beauty is more than the thing's beauty. Immediately, the mystery of something overwhelming it glimmers.

This evidence is always wider and more different, always exceeding the concept's margins, it is what that that is mysterious in what it is seen, namely what cannot be expressed, what it is fitted as contemplative element to the rational element. But this element characteristic to the contemplation it doesn't appear, it isn't being developed except on the occasion of the rational efforts, at its turn stimulating those efforts. The contemplative element always appears as a plus over the rational meaning, and not like a minus. Being this plus present on all levels, we could say that all the time the reasoning is accompanied by contemplation. But it still is advisable to be reserved the name of contemplation to this stage of rapid noticing the rationalities from within things and of the plus corresponding to this level.

This rapid noticing of the spiritual meaning of the things, and of the plus of meaning, it differs from the phenomenological intuition which doesn't know about such a preparation. Even the act of religiously knowing God, which Scheler speaks about, it wouldn't be capable, we reckon, of such intuitions which become steadfast, without the previous levels mentioned, namely without a long moral preparation. They can take place mostly on rare moments; while the contemplation which the Holy Fathers speak about, though striking like the lightening, it is like a permanent lightening. The spiritually grown up man relates all the things immediately and continuously to God, namely he contemplates God through everything. Of course, the spiritual man doesn't reject the discursive cogitation. But he does this operation often after he has contemplated in an instant and simultaneously the thing and its relation with God, or in the same time with the contemplation. This unfolding in its components and its rational demonstration of a direct lightening vision, it takes that one, at its turn, even further, as we have prepared it before too. The discursive reasoning and the flashing contemplation do not exclude on each other, for the last one it has grown up out of the first one, or also out of the first one, being again a departure point to the reasoning. The contemplation is a reasoning of a species of reasoning, plus an element not included in them but occasioned by them, and the reasoning is a contemplation unfolded to a point in what the contemplation has a possible to define meanings.

The antique Eastern writings say about this rapid discernment that it is also a gift received from above and a capacity achieved in time, being characteristic to the advanced ones. That's why the monk must ask for their advice in everything. The fact that it is achieved gradually and it doesn't appear suddenly, out of the blue sky, it confirms what we have said concerning the gradual gaining of the capacity of "seeing" at once the things' rationalities, and the rationalities of the deeds to commit. But the fact that it is a gift too, it shows on one hand that the effort for gradually gaining it, it is guided and upheld by a grace of the holy Ghost, which helps to be a certain disposition developed within man; and on the other hand, in addition to upholding this effort that develops the man's power of understanding, the grace opens a plus of unveiling, of evidence, which doesn't exclude a previous rational development. The contemplation isn't a flashing of evidence coming to someone unprepared, but, as Saint Maximos the Confessor said, it comes consequently to a long searching for. But then it isn't only what comes out of this searching for, but it is also gift or self-opening of the Holy Ghost, after He was also the One urging us to undertake this searching.

5) The capacity of discerning rapidly and more nuanced the rationalities of the things and of the human individual deeds, it means, in the same time, the capacity of noticing the ties of a thing's rationality, or of a deed, with the rationalities of other things, or with the rationalities of other deeds.

Through habituation, this capacity gains the power of seeing each thing's meaning in connection with the world's ensemble, as also the capacity of seeing each deed in connection with the whole life of the respective man, or with the other people's lives. He sees now unitarily the truth or the meaning which animates and tied all things, as irradiation out of each thing, out of each virtuous deed. This is the wisdom. This makes impossible the unilateral judgments or the need for later retractions, for on each time the wise man, on the basis of the integral vision of the truth in everything he gives a balanced judgment, namely a judgment that keep all things in balance, not leaning towards a side or another.

That's why, after somebody has been elevated through the habituation of the exact, nuanced, and rapid discernment regarding the individual things and deeds, to wisdom, namely to the capacity of looking at the unique truth in the world's ensemble, each time he will have to emit a judgment upon the individual things and deeds, he will start from this ensemble vision, by taking in account the unitary truth seen in everything.

As in case of noticing the individual rationalities in front of the mind there has glimmered a plus of evidence that exceeds by a lot the borders of any concept and of any reasoning, for being the image of the divine Logos mirrored within world. The more we deepen ourselves in cogitating on this image, the more we progress on the line of the divine energies towards the heavenly model and the more we realize His infinity. But this progress means in the same time increasing in the understanding caught in ever nuanced concepts, increasingly comprising concepts.

The divine Logos is to us the virtual bosom of all the concepts and meanings. But He remains always much more and otherwise than one can comprise in concepts. The fact that no concept can comprise the Logos in an adequate manner – fact for which the Holy Fathers reckon the identification of God to the concept about Him as being worshipping of an idol, because of the idol means elevating something created to the level of the absolute – it cannot stop us, until we still do not claim of aiming the godlike Being Himself, from catching again in concepts, some things regarding His rationalities or the role of definitions which we are aware of the possibility of being always surpassed. Otherwise, one no longer would be able to say anything about God and the religious life of the many couldn't be upheld and it couldn't progress. Besides that, the Holy Fathers assertively affirm the development of the faith in Gnosis, namely in a certain understanding, through the mediation of the virtues. By considering as justified the apophatic theology referring to the divine Being, we reckon in an exaggerated manner that from here to be deduced a removal, in any conditions, of the concepts.

Even N. Lossky, who accentuates the apophatism so much, he admits to a degree the necessity of the concepts.” (Stăniloae 1992: 175-181)

“Thus, we have known the Truth. We no longer reckon the world as ultimate truth, but we reckon Christ as ultimate truth, the Son of God, the Creator of the world and of the people, the Savior of the people from under the power of the death and from the perspective of the hell's darkness. We have known Christ as Light, or as supreme positive meaning of the world and of the people. We have known that He is the Truth out of which are brought all the things. We have known that the ones reckoning the world as ultimate truth they are in lie, and they take the darkness of an atheistic “culture” as luminous light. We have known that the ones who do not know Christ as the embodied Son of God, and, consequently, as the Light of the world, but they rather reckon the world as the unique reality, they are in a big lie. We have known that all the words which they employ in order to argue this liar opinion, are only lies. We have known that, adopting such an atheistic position, the people are going to live in an eternal depletion and death.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 79-80)

“Christ alone is the Truth, for only Himself, as God Who came in body, to us, he is the path leading us to the endless life. He is the “Path, the Truth, and the Life”. He is the Path for He is the Truth and for He is the Life; he is the Life for He is the Truth. He is the only One in Whom we have the true life, in Whom the creation is united with the Creator. The ones denying Christ as true Life, the ones denying that He is the sole path towards the true life, they affirm the lie and the death as truth. And the one alluring the people towards this lie, the first one to affirm this lie and the one continuing to argue it, it is the devil. The devil affirms this world as the ultimate reality, not showing a path towards God as differing from the world, but he leads through his lie towards death, which the ones serving him are in, even from here, but they can get rid of that lie before they die with the body, by immediately starting to follow Christ. The ones who do not recognize Christ as path towards God Who is above the world, but they reckon the world as the sole reality, they do not know any way of escaping from the death from within world. God-the Word helped the people to follow Him, before Christ’s embodiment, through His Word. But the world still was in darkness. Through embodiment, Christ came within world and he scattered the darkness in the ones who have received the faith in Him. The ones who do not believe in Him as the Son and the Word of God Who came in order to shows us that God is love, they consider that everything is mastered by the darkness, by the lack of meaning, and they afford to themselves to do the evil as a form of their egotism. Those ones will be condemned for eternity, unlike the ones who, by believing that God is love and that Christ is the embodied Son of the Father as a proof of God’s love, and who imitate Christ by doing deeds of love, they won’t be condemned but they will enjoy the eternal and happy communion with the God of the love.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 80-81)

“Jesus Christ is the Truth, or the real Life, for He is the Son of the Father. If God hadn’t had a Son, there wouldn’t have been love in God, neither the people would have been created by a God of the love, in order to be made through His Son as His sons. In this sense Christ affirms that He is the Truth, for He is, through nature, the Son of a Supreme Father. So, the ones believing in Christ as Son of the Father, they believe in a true God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 82)

“Jesus Christ is the Truth, and therefore He is the meaning of our life, for the One Who is the Life in Himself, by embodying Himself as man, He has given the man eternal life, He escaping the man from death. Without Christ, namely without the Son of God embodied like man, the entire world and the people’s existence would have been meaningless. Christ has made Himself, through embodiment, “the Light of the world”, namely the world’s meaning. The Son and the Word of God, in His quality as God in Himself, He is Himself, the Light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 82-83)

“The truth, the good, the life, and the luminous light, they are one. The evil, the death, the darkness, and the lie, they are one too. And all of them have a personal character. The lie deceives, by giving the spiritual death an appearance as life, and by giving the evil the appearance of the person’s wellness in egotistic sense, and by giving the darkness an appearance of luminous light. The lie presents all of these as being truth.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 83)

“The Truth is the Person, of the supreme communion or supreme Persons. This is for the supreme communion is the plenary existence, the existence by oneself, and endless, the living and enduring and the love-giving existence. The truth isn’t a cogitated principle, or a law, of a general formula, which our rationality can possess. The Truth is the supreme, independent from us, existence, that gives us life and that keeps us alive, that is One with the life by Oneself and in Oneself, and Who surely has the power of creating and of upholding all the things, by giving life to everybody by His will and not as forced by a law or by a power superior to Him, but only by His free will (Jn. 14: 6). He is the living water, which the human being if thirsty forever, or which the human being won’t ever consider that he has had enough (Jn. 4: 15). Only for the man is, at his turn, a person in the image of the supreme Person Who communicated, on Himself, from ever, to other Person, only for that the human being is truth at his turn, and that’s why he can give himself as true life and as living water, to others too. But the human being’s quality as image of the Truth, and depending on the Truth, the human being sees it especially in the unquenchable longing, or in the unquenchable thirst for the supreme Person Who is from ever in communion with other Two supreme Persons, as also in the fact that, in his quality as image of That Person in communion with other Two supreme Persons, he doesn’t have his life except in communion with other persons.” (Stăniloae 1995: 136)

“Being in threefold communion of Persons, God is the Truth and the living and all-comprising Mystery, or the whole life’s Mystery, a Mystery Who cannot be known throughs speculations, but he can be known by the human being who sips his life from Him, and the human person is, at his turn, a living mystery, who cannot be known by other person except by being received by those persons.” (Stăniloae 1995: 136)

Unapproachable Light

“Palamas started to prove in writing, by using quoted taken from the Holy Fathers, that that light is uncreated and eternal. Barlaam answered then, that if such had been that light, then it would have been the Being of God, and therefore Palamas argued that the Being of God could be seen and communicated, and that is Messalianism. Palamas answered by discerning between the godlike Being and the godlike work: while the first one is indivisible and unimpartable, the second one is on the opposite. But the second one too, it is called by the Holy Fathers as godhead. Barlaam answered that Palamas affirmed two godhead, one superior and one inferior, so that Palamas was a deist. Palamas answered that though both the godlike grace and the godlike work are called a godhead, and though the Being is indivisible and incommunicable, and the grace is divisible and communicable to the righteous ones, there still aren't two godheads, but there is only one godhead: the Being with his work, a work not separated from the being.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 23)

“Palamas wrote the first Triad against Barlaam's affirmations (around the beginning of the year 1338, or the end of the year 1337) without mentioning Barlaam's name. In the first treaty, entitled: The First Treaty from the First Treaties, for the Ones Living with Holiness in Hesychasm; towards What and to what Extent Is Useful the Occupation with the Sciences, Palamas rejected the affirmation ghat only the sciences produce the knowledge about God. The second treaty, entitled: The Second Treaty from the First Treaties, for the Ones Who Dedicate Themselves with Awe to Hesychasm, It Is Not Useless to Try Keeping Their Mind Inside Their Body. The content is mentioned in the title. The third treaty, entitled: About the Godlike Light and Lighting, about the Holy Happiness and about the Consummation into Christ. In this treaty Palamas documented in Scriptural and Patristic manner that as well the Tabor Light and the light seen by the righteous ones in this world, it is uncreated and eternal light. Here took place the main attack, because Barlaam affirmed that such a light is a devilish hallucination.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 24)

“The titles of the three last treaties are:

1. The First Treaty from the Last Treaties for the One Who Dedicate Themselves with Awe to Hesychasm. Presenting and Combating the Affirmations of philosopher Barlaam, Made Against the One Who Live with Awe in the Hesychasm. Which Is the Really Savior Knowledge Sought For, with Much Interest, by the True Monks; or against the One Saying that the Knowledge Coming from the External sciences It Is truly Savior.
2. The Second Treaty from the Last Treaties for the One Dedicating Themselves with Awe to Hesychasm. About Prayer.
3. The Third Treaty from the Last Treaties for the Ones Dedicating Themselves with Awe to Hesychasm. About the Holy Light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 26)

“Palamas said that no hesychast and no man argues that there is a mental light having it sown hypostasis (self-standing), which not to be either God or angel of man. (...) And the hesychasts reckon the Being of God not only invisible and inaccessible to any human sense, but even beyond what is inaccessible and invisible to senses. It is above not only to any affirmation, but it is also about any negation. And they reckon the light as brightness and godlike grace, sometimes seen and known in a not-understand manner, only through experience. (...) They know that (the unapproachable light, E. l. t.’s n.) it isn’t the Being of God, for the Being of God is untouchable and unimpartable; it is not an angel too, for it bears godlike characteristics. Sometimes it gets the man out of his body, as on Paul, and some other times it transfigures the body, by lighting it up and by deifying it, as in case of Moses when coming down from Mount Sinai. Sometimes it becomes perceivable by the bodily eyes too, and this is a great wonder. Sometimes it even speaks, to the one seeing it, with untold words, as it did to Paul. This thing is called, by Scripture, by the Holy Fathers, and by hesychasts, as light. If Barlaam has a better name for it, let him tell it.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 54)

“That light (the unapproachable light, E. l. t.’s n.) it isn’t an angel, for the angels shows themselves in different images, and only to the ones who are clean of passions. It isn’t the mind itself either, as it would see itself. The cleaned and illuminated mind and reached partaker to the godlike grace, it looks at other mystical views too. The mind sees also on itself, but then the mind knows that it doesn’t see something else, though the mind sees itself differently, illuminated by the godlike grace that helps the mind to surpass itself and to see God in Ghost.

And for this it is necessary only the cleaning of passions, and not also of nescience, as said Barlaam. Through the perseverant and immaterial prayer, the mind is elevated beyond any knowledge.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 54)

“Palamas invokes places from the writing of the Holy Fathers, in order to demonstrate that those too knew about two lights. So, from Saint Isaac the Syrian who said that we have two eyes of the soul, and with one of them we see the mysteries from within nature, namely: the power, the wisdom, and the Providence of God; “and with the other one we see the glory of His holy nature, when God deigns to introduce us in the spiritual mysteries”. It is about the glory from before the creation of the world, which the Savior said about that He wants to be seen by His descendants (Jo. 17: 24). This glory isn’t, as one can see, the nature of God, but it neither is something temporal, but it not-separated from the godlike nature. It cannot be seen or gained, as Saint Isaac the Syrian said, by researching the things’ structure, because by doing so one only can know the godlike: power, wisdom, and Providence. The glory can be seen with another eye and it is about other light than the knowledge about things. Knowing God out of things it is vague and problematic; the one who sees the second light, a light that is above any creature, he has just in himself, God Who is not separated from His glory. And to see this light reaches that one who observes the commandments of God and who loves God, as the Lord says (Jo. 14: 24). Therefore, the unapproachable light is something else that the knowledge achieved from sciences.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 54)

“This glory was seen by the three Apostles on Mount Tabor (Lk. 9: 32), when “His face shined like the sun and His clothes were white as the light” (Mt. 17: 2). About this light says Peter (II Pt. 1: 19) that it shines within the believers’ hearts and it is way brighter not only than the knowledge of the created things, but even than the knowledge of the Holy Scripture.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 55)

“Using quotes from the Holy Fathers Palamas showed that the Tabor Light wasn’t the glory of the body, but it was the glory of the godlike nature that, by being united in one of its hypostases with that body, it has placed in that body the whole its glory and brightness. One cannot say about this glory that now it is, and then it isn’t, being produce and then being destroyed, showing itself and then totally perishing like some fireworks or like some symbols without subsistence. When Barlaam called the Tabor Light as symbol, based on the writing of Saint Maximos the Confessor, Palamas showed that Maximos used the word symbol for a thing, not with the meaning that that thing doesn’t really exists but it is only a figment, but with the meaning that it is a step elevating you higher towards the godlike things. Thus, in the same place, Maximos called Moses as symbol of the judgment, on Elijah as symbol of the Providence, on Peter as symbol of the faith, on James as symbol of the hope, and on John as symbol of the love. All of them aren’t only unreal contrivances, now taking place and then disappearing, but they really exist. Through them it is only eased the vision of the things from above them. In other words, Maximos and Dionysus the Areopagite show that that light is above senses and about mind. Apostle Paul, when speaking about his elevation to the third heaven (II Cor. 12: 2-4) he says that he heard untold words and he knows that he was kidnapped to Paradise but he doesn’t know whether he was into body or outside body – and this is a proof to Palamas that feeling these things it is above sense and mind. Dionysus the Areopagite called that light as visible but as not sensitive.

But Paul, elevated to the third heaven, he didn’t see the Being of God; likewise did the three ones purified through hesychasm. They knew that the godlike Being is above what the saw. And they knew that not by cogitating, but by seeing; they experimented this negation – they didn’t cogitate it with their mind. As experiencing and seeing the godlike things surpasses any affirmative theology, likewise experiencing in this sight the fact that the Being exceeds what is being seen, it surpasses any negative theology. This light and this glory don't belong only to one Person, but they belong to all Three Persons, for it belongs to the godlike nature. That's why this light cannot be seen by human power no matter how strong would that power be, neither by angelic help, but only by godlike power. About the proto-martyr Stephen it is said in the Acts of the Apostles (7: 55) that he saw that light for "he was full of Holy Ghost". Therefore, only by being accomplished a union with God, one can see that light. The angels can unveil us many things, but that light isn't conveyed us through the angels' mediation. We are found worthy of godlike views, as the angels too, only in an unmediated mode. The charisma of the knowledge is mostly given through angels (for instance the Moses's Law), but the godlike views are shown directly. These mystical views show us diverse things: present, future, sensitive, ideal things etc. And each one of these things is seen differently, according to the power of the one who sees those things." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 56-57)

"Nobody has seen God, neither somebody will, either man, or angel; but this is because they are man or angel and they look at things sensitively or mentally. But the one who have become ghost and who looks at things in Ghost, what that one couldn't see That One through That One? Neither through this sight into ghost one can see the whole godlike light, namely the infinity of the power of God it cannot be comprised. That brightness gives the eye of the one who is united with God, increasingly more power, it makes him comprising increasingly more of that brightness, but he won't even reach the end of it, but that light surrounds him with ever brighter rays. That's why the saints call this light – through which, by ceasing the whole power of the knowledge, one is united with and the God of the gods shows Himself to him – as infinite. Through the impartation with something higher, those ones are also transformed in an ascending sense, and by changing their powers, the whole their soul's and body's work ceases, so that is manifested and seen through them only what there are imparted with, their natural notes being overcome by the abundance of the glory, in order God to be everything in all things, as the Apostle said. They become like the angels from heaven who see the face of the Father. Being united with this light which differs from any other existences, they know that this light isn't anything from the created things. The union itself is done after detaching from all the created things. One says too, about this light, that it doesn't exist, meaning that this light exceeds all the existing things. This light is above knowledge, though it is metaphorically called as knowledge. But it rather can be called as nescience, meaning that it exceeds any science, for it isn't a species of knowledge, and it doesn't fall into the general sphere of the notion of knowledge. Of course, it neither can be called as nescience in a proper sense.

One cannot find a proper name to this union. One cannot call it properly neither as sight nor as feeling, neither knowledge, not understanding of illumination. Therefore, Barlaam was wrong placing this union in the general category of the knowledge, because then it must belong to this category also the nescience too, since this union is also called as nescience. It doesn't belong to this category of knowledge, as it also doesn't belong, the supra-existential being of God, to the general category of the being.

Then, what is this union, that isn't, in the sense of surpassing, nothing from the existing things? Isn't this apophatic theology? Of course not, for it isn't negation as the apophatic theology is, but it is union. For union are necessary the ecstasy and the piety, unlike for the apophatic theology. The apophatic theology can be understood and expressed, while that union is untold and not-understood even by the ones who experience it. The light of the apophatic theology is knowledge and rationality, while the light of the union is subsistent light. The union is what the Holy Fathers called as: "The end of the prayer is the kidnapping to God". This is for in prayer, the mind, by gradually detaching itself from the things, firstly from the ugly and evil things, then from the unmediated things – the tendency of knowing them during the prayer it comes from the enemy – it wholly detached from all the things. This detachment from all the things, this ecstasy is way superior to the negative theology, for only the ones who have reached the dispassion can obtain it. And the union isn't accomplished until the Ghost will lighten from above and until the Ghost won't kidnap to see the light, on the one who has reached, by praying, above the peaks of his natural powers, and he has been waiting there for the promise of the Father. This union has a beginning and a consequence, as it is more obscure or more luminous. But it doesn't have an end, for it can progress infinitely. It can be a short illumination, or a longer sight, or a durable one." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 57-58)

"Who reached into that light, he sees and he doesn't see, said Dionysus the Areopagite. How comes that? For he sees, he said, above seeing. So, that one actually knows and sees; he doesn't see in the meaning of exceeding, not seeing through some work of the sense or of the mind, seeing just because the fact that he doesn't see and that he doesn't know, namely by the fact that he has exceeded any natural noetic work. His sight is higher than the human sight, for he has become God by grace, he has been united with God, and he sees through God. What far behind it is the apophatic theology like, which is actually a nescience, and not in the meaning of exceeding. And what absurd is to declare this nescience, in a proper meaning, as the highest level of the knowledge." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 61-62)

"Dionysus the Areopagite speaks in another place about the light which will illuminate the righteous ones in their future life, and which is identical to the Tabor's Light. That light will be seen sensitively, and mentally, but especially spiritually, and in godlike manner. This is for the mind mysteriously united with the sense, it sees the sensitive things and the sense represent symbolically and sensitively the sensitive things due to the connection the sense has with the mind, likewise, these two, united with the Ghost, they will spiritually see that light. We won't leave, says Palamas, this light, in order to descend (...). Dionysus the Areopagite placed the godlike light above all things. He called as darkness, that light itself, due to its abundance. For he wrote to Dorotheos: "The godlike darkness it is the unapproachable light, due to the abundant overflowing of light. In that darkness reaches anyone who wants to know and to see God, and who, in order to achieve that, he is elevated above sight and knowledge, just because of not seeing and of not knowing, but knowing that he is beyond the sensitive things". Here Dionysus called as darkness and then as light, and he said that it can be seen, and then that it cannot be seen, as also that it can be known and then that it cannot be known. But for he said that this light is darkness too, because of the abundance of the light, it is obviously that it is, actually, light. It is called as darkness in the sense of exceeding, as one that cannot be seen by the ones who want to see it and to perceive it with their sense and through their heart's works. In this darkness or in this light cannot reach except the saints, and the apophatic theology being possibly handled by any man, it is obvious that the two ones aren't identical to one another, and the first one is incomparably higher than the second one." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 61)

"If the apophatic theology had been higher than that light, then the wisdom of the Hellenes would have been higher than the view from Tabor, and higher than the future good things which consists specifically of this view." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 62)

"It is right that Dionysus the Great said that Moses had to leave all the heavenly sounds and all the godlike light in order to enter the godlike darkness, but Dionysus himself showed in continuation, that in that place he understood by lights some introductory visions. By no means he said about the denial of all the light (...) for in that darkness Moses saw something: namely, he saw the immaterial tent, which Moses showed in a material form to the people waiting for him at the foot of the mountain. This immaterial tent would be, according to the Holy Fathers, Christ Himself, the Power of God and His Wisdom, subsistent by itself, immaterial according to its nature, and uncreated, but foretelling through the Mosaic tent, that it follows to receive a material image; the Tent which comprises all the things from before time, and in which have been created and are being maintained all the seen and the unseen things. The Mosaic tent and the things from within it, they are sensitive symbols. But the views of Moses weren't symbols in themselves, for, as Dionysus said there, in order Moses to enter that darkness "he had to surpass all the sensations, all the impressions, all the ideas, even the clean ones. Se saw something totally immaterial, simple, unchanged, and shapeless”.

Moses saw those, so they were visible. There were, so, either light or in the light. But because all of them were simple, they were light. And for Moses saw them by exceeding himself, he didn't see neither through sense, nor through mind. In the same light is that one that sees; it sees on itself and it understands itself through itself. The mind, by exceeding itself, it loses its natural eye (of course in the meaning of exceeding it), and by being filled up with the blinding brightness of the godlike light and by being united with God, the light itself is the one seeing on itself, within mind. But this doesn't mean that the godlike no longer is hidden. The godlike doesn't come out of its hidden, but it attracts other too, in that hidden, under the godlike darkness. Moses was no longer seen, during that time, by people. And even more than that, by exceeding on himself, and by detaching in an untold mode from himself, and by being elevated above any sensitive and mental work, oh wonder! he even hid himself to himself. Likewise did Paul. So that, by seeing, they didn't know who was seeing, but they were asking who was the seeing one? So, the Holy Fathers by seeing now and in the future age, that light, they know that that light is above their sight too, and in this is given the possibility of a continual progress in seeing. And this seeing of the godlike things is way superior to the affirmative or to the negative theologies; like the words of the blind ones describing the sun are way inferior than seeing the sun by the ones who see, and the sun is even above sight.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 62-63)

“Barlaam didn't like the term seeing. Palamas answered that it can be called also as understanding above any mental work.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 63)

“Therefore, the life conveyed by the Holy Ghost isn't created by Himself but it is given from within Himself. And, in order not to think somebody that this life is something existential to the Ghost, Saint Basil the Great said: “And the ones who are imparted with Him, they live in a godlike manner, by receiving earthly and heavenly life”. This life is always within the Ghost in a natural manner. This life is called by the Saints both as Ghost and as Godhead, as one that by being deifying gift it still isn't separated from the Ghost Who gives it. And this is light, for it is provided through an untold illumination. But the Ghost is above His grace, or above His work, not only as because of His, but also because the grace always is only a small part, by not comprising the receiver in the whole godlike work. Thus, God is from several points of view, above this light and above this uncreated life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 66-67)

“By using quotes from Symeon Metaphrastes and from Dionysus the Areopagite, Palamas proved again that the light on the face of Moses, or that light from Mount Tabor, it wasn't a sensitive light, but it was the itself glory of the godhead, for it will be seen by the Saints in the future life." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 67)

"Barlaam argued that "that light was seen also through air; it was produced then in order to amaze, but it immediately perished; and it is called as godhead for it is symbol of the godhead". Palamas asked him what can be called as godhead like, something sensitive, and having only a momentary existence? And what is that light sensitive like, since it will be seen in the future life too, where we won't need air, nor space or something similar? And then, will we see only symbol in the future life too? The Holy Fathers say that the light on Tabor it was the godhead himself. Gregory the Theologian said: "Light id the godhead shown, on the mountain, to the disciples". John Chrysostom: "The Lord showed Himself shinier than Himself, the Godhead showing His says". Basil the Great;" The Godhead is unapproachable light... That's why the apostles fell on their faces, for not being able to look at the glory of the Son's light, for it is unapproachable light. Light is the Ghost too, for it was said: "Who lightened in our hearts through the Ghost". And at the Transfiguration we sing: "In Your light shown today on Tabor we have seen the Father as light, and the Ghost, for You have unveiled the hidden ray of the Godhead". (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 67)

"If the light from Tabor is sometimes called as symbol, then either will be a natural symbol, or not. If it is not a natural symbol, then it will be either subsisting by itself, or it will only be a non-subsistent phantasm. And if it had been a non-subsistent phantasm, Christ wouldn't have been like that, He isn't, and He won't be like so, for ever and ever. Or, all the Holy Fathers say that Christ will come to judge us bearing that light, and He will be like that forever and ever. Christ was like that even before ascending on mount Tabor. This is for Damascene said: "Christ transfigures His face not by impropriating something that He didn't have before, neither by transforming Himself in something that He wasn't before, but by showing Himself as He was, to His disciples, by opening the disciples' eyes and by making them from blind in seer. This is for He is the true light, the beauty of the glory". Therefore, that light wasn't a phantasm. So He was, and so will be Christ, forever and ever. The Holy Fathers say that even now, by sitting on the right hand of the Father, Christ is full of light. For instance, Makarios the Great, paraphrased by Simeon Metaphrastes, said: "The dough of the human nature impropriated by the Lord, it has been placed on the right hand of the glory from heavens, full of glory; not only in His face, like Moses had, but in all Lord's body". (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 68)

"If it is isn't only a passing phantasm, could that light be something subsisting by itself, separated from the symbolized godhead, and brought in connection with the godhead only accidentally? But what that something is, and where it is? And if it is self-subsistent, but it is forever with Christ, as it has been proved, than Christ will consist of three natures: godlike, human, and that light. By not being that light either phantasm or of foreign nature, it turns out that that light belongs to the godhead of Christ, and it is the natural symbol of it.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 68)

“The Holy Fathers didn’t call it (the unapproachable light, E. l. t.’s n.) as self-subsistent, but they called it as subsistent. They didn’t call it as self-subsistent because it doesn’t form its own hypostasis. They didn’t call it either as non-subsistent, for through such a notion it is indicated what doesn’t really exist and what it is only a phantasm, either something whose existence rapidly decomposes, as it is the lightening, or our cogitation on a given moment. In order to indicate the durability, the stability of that light, they called it as subsistent. Barlaam declared it as subsistent in the sense that that light forms by itself a hypostasis, that it is self-subsistent, and that’s not the case.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 68)

“If the light from Tabor is a natural symbol, it won’t mean that it will be a natural symbol of both cases. This is because each nature has other natural features. But that light it could be the natural symbol of the human nature. Our natura isn’t light; and Jesus didn’t ask His disciples to accompany Him on Mount Tabor in order to show them, on Himself, like man. As man the disciples had been seeing Him for three years already. So, that light was a natural symbol of the godhead. And as such it is eternal, for the things seen at God, existentially, they are without beginning and without end, said Maximos the Confessor.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 68)

“The fact that the light from Mount Tabor belongs to the Lord’s nature it can be seen from Maximos the Confessor said that the Lord had made Himself, for His love for people, His own symbol. If the Lord had made something else, but not on Himself, as His symbol, that light wouldn’t have belonged to His nature. Only when the symbol naturally belongs to the one whom that symbol symbolizes, we can say that the symbolized one makes on himself as his own symbol. The caustic power of the fire, by emanating the warmth perceivable through senses, it makes on itself its own symbol; the emanated warmth is always with it, and in it, and it isn’t doubled because of it. The sense perceiving the fire’s warmth, it cannot know the power which emanates that warmth, so, it only knows that that power exists; but it doesn’t know what it is like and what big is like. Only if it had become fire and it had ceased to be a sense, it would have known the power that emanates the warmth. But by trying to know this power and still remain a sense, it will quickly bounce backwards, because of not being able to endure the burning.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 69)

“That light belongs, existentially, naturally, to God, but not to His nature itself. It is an existential power, as the kindness, as the life etc. Dionysus the Areopagite said: “When we name the hidden from above being, as God, or as life, or as being, we do not understand something else than the providential powers emitted from God – Who is non-shareable”. So, all of these are powers. The One Who possesses these powers together and unitarily, He is supra-existential. Likewise, it is that light: it is existential, but it isn’t the being itself of God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 69)

“The eternal glory of God it isn’t His non-shareable being, for the eternal glory of God has been seen by that many people; and what can be seen it is sharable to. The angels and the saints are united with it, while the being of God remains untouched and unseen. But this glory isn’t a created one, for Dionysus the Areopagite said that “the angels are united with the rays without beginning and without end of the Good and of the Beautiful”. One can see that this glory is uncreated also from the fact that it cannot be seen with the natural eyes and mind, but it only can be seen with a power that is above these ones, namely with the power of the Holy Ghost. Not even the angels can see it with their natural power, and a proof to this is the fact that the evil angels do not see it; but they haven’t lost the natural power of the mind for they knew that Christ is the Son of God. And that’s why we can see that that light isn’t identical to knowing through the mind, despite being also called as knowledge as one being a source of knowledge. As it is also called as godhead, for it is the work of God. The illuminated one has a beginning and he started to be illuminated, but the light illuminating him it doesn’t have a beginning.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 74)

“The hesychasts considered that unapproachable light, namely inaccessible on the natural was of the senses, as being above nature and above angels and only perceivable through the power of the Holy Ghost. If it is above senses, above mind, and above angels, it will be obvious that it belongs to godhead, and it is “truly godlike”. It is immaterial and permanent and it has all the features coming from the mentioned notes, the “alike features.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 92)

“At John Damascene we find expressions like: “Today the abyss of the unapproachable light, today borderless overflowing of godlike brightness... Now have been shown the things unseen by human eyes... The mortal body springs the godhead’s glory out ... The body’s glory hasn’t been brought from outside, but from inside, from the supra-godlike godhead of the Word of God, hypostatically unite, in an untold manner, with the body... He took the first ones amongst the apostles as witness of His glory and of His godhead and He unveiled them His godhead... the godlike glory, that one that transcends all things, the only one above all things and before all things... John saw the non-temporal glory of the Son... The One Who has been born, without beginning, from the Father, He has the natural and without beginning ray of the godhead, and the glory of the godhead becomes glory of the body... These are the ones unseen by the eye and unheard by the ear and which didn't ascend to the man's heart. So will we be in the future age, always with the Lord, looking at Christ in the radiating light of the godhead..." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 94)

"At Andrew of Crete we find: "The Savior take the disciples up on the high mountain... in order to show them the above light glory and brightness, of His own godhead... The disciples, by getting out of body and of world, as much as it was possible, they knew the state from the future age, out of the things which they experienced... The unapproachable and non-temporal light has transfigured the own body, and it shined above the being, through the abundance of the own light spring...". And the apostles didn't see that light through their natural powers, but by exceeding their own nature, and that was shown by the fact that they fell in a deep sleep." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 94)

"Without any doubt, when speaking about the unapproachable light, one cannot express himself with mathematical precision and in a totally adequate mode. Unavoidably, one must use comparisons and approximate terms. But this doesn't mean that from the total perspective one cannot detach pretty clearly a certain idea about the godlike light. We must admit, thus, that the Holy Fathers (John Damascene and Andrew of Crete, E. l. t.'s n.) wanted to express too, a certain opinion about the godlike light, and not only to get drunk in a bombastic terminology. Which is their opinion about the godlike light, as we can see it in their words? Of course, it is an opinion not at all differing from the opinion of the hesychasts. They too said, that is a light that cannot be reached through the natural powers, a light that is above nature and angels, a light that isn't a material light, and a light that is spread around by the godhead of the embodied Word. The manner of the Catholic theologians, of quickly passing over such expressions, without finding those expression worthy even of some analysis, but by considering them as oratorical exaggerations and metaphors good for nothing, it is at least superficial, if not in bad faith." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 94-95)

"The Emperor Andronicus the III, said: "Let nobody to believe, by hearing us extolling that all-godlike light, that we reckon as visible the nature of God. This for though the ones who were united on the mountain, with Christ, they reached such a height of the sight, they only saw the grace and the godlike glory, and not itself the nature which provides the grace. We only know that, taught by the godlike words, as being: non-shareable, non-comprisable, undividable, either to the highest supra-worldly powers, not leaving even the smallest trace to the ones which are below it". A clearer exposition of the hesychastic doctrine it would be impossible." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 96)

“Palamas answered the accusation of ditheism and polytheism by arguing that the brightness of the godlike being it doesn’t impede to be there a unique and simple godhead. Even if this brightness is uncreated and it is too, called as godhead. Likewise, the godlike Providence, or the Light from Tabor, of the deifying grace. Like the cogitation, namely the activity of the mind, it doesn’t make two minds, likewise, between the movement’s subject and subject it doesn’t take place a composition.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 133)

“The subtraction stone was, to Akindynos as it was to Barlaam too, the possibility of seeing the unapproachable light with the eyes. Palamas answered him, as he did to Barlaam too: the eyes see that light while they are transformed by the power of the Ghost and by receive a power which they eyes didn’t have before. The one seeing, actually, it is no longer the eye, but it is the Holy Ghost come within man. The eye sees these into Ghost, in a godlike manner, and above nature. The non-spiritual man, of course, he cannot see or understand that.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 140)

“The deification and the light from Tabor aren’t something self-standing, but they are a relation. (...) Palamas said that the relation doesn’t indicate an existence, but it expresses the joining of two existence, the bond within them, which is something else than the being of those two existences (f. 269 r. -v; 271 r.). The fact that the light from Tabor isn’t a simple imagination, it can be seen also from the fact that that light existed also before the world to exist. Basile the Great said: “If there existed something before the founding this sensitive and corruptible world, that existed within light”. This light is, according to Basile the Great, above sky and above world. In this light are going the Saints. Theophanous sang about angels that they are: “embers lit by the godlike being, and who radiate as some mirrors the rays of the original godlike light, and that’s why they are called the secondary lights” (f. 271 v.). The Saints’ ghosts live within this life. Basil the Great said that when Christ will come, everybody will be crossed through by a lighting power and that power will continuously and ceaselessly soak up the righteous ones with light, and so it will make them “other suns” (f. 272). So, the light from Tabor is eternal, without beginning and without end.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 160)

“Gregory the Theologian said in the speech urging to Baptism, that God is “the most far and unapproachable light”. Then he added that that light is poured, a little, to the ones from outside too. And to be poured is characteristic to the grace and not to the being, for the being remains totally unshown and inscrutable. Saint John Chrysostom, speaking about the Transfiguration, said that Christ showed His glory not as it was, but as the present apostle could receive. But only the work of God can be divided, and not His being. Therefore, God is called as light, not according to His being, but according to His glory and grace and brightness.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 161)

“A whole series of Holy Fathers confessed that the light shown by God to the saints, it is something else than the knowledge form the created things, that it is the glory of the godlike nature, and it is not a product of the fantasy or something resembling to the sensitive lights. That light is the core and the substance and the beauty of the age to come. It is the only true, eternal, unchanged light, which we too, become light through, as some sons of the light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 58)

“I even reckon that light – says Palamas – as a sight of the heart, of another nature, above any sensitive perceptions and above all understanding, as one exceeding the powers of our soul. Doesn’t say Paul (Hebr. 11: 13), about the righteous ones of the Old Testament, that they “died not by taking the promises, but by seeing them from far and by kissing them”. There is also, therefore, an understanding of the heart, above all the mental works, and above understanding. And even higher. This is for our faith is above any understanding. But the sight of the one who died in faith it is above our faith, for it is no longer only a sight from far, but it is joy, it is impartation with those things. And those good things which are above sense and above understanding, they aren’t the godlike being itself; the godlike being is above those things, as foundation of theirs.

The ones not admitting such a sight above understanding, they do not reckon God as so high, because they reckon that the mind is enough in order to know God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 59)

“The light from the resurrected body of Christ and from our body which we will resurrect with, as also the light shown out of His body on the Mount Tabor, and that more reduced light that illuminates the face of the clean and kind ones, it cannot be a light of physical character, though the body too, it becomes transparent to it. In order to understand this light one must start from the light shown on the face of the kind man, or as a circle of light surrounding the head of the saints. In this light is shown Christ too, in the hesychasts’ hearts. This spiritual character, but only visible to the eyes of the three spiritualized Apostles, was had also by the light that surrounded Christ on Mount Tabor.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 122)

“The godlike spirit Himself can make Himself spiritually felt, through the irradiation of His love, and the human spirit can feel this loving irradiation of His. And this can extend, as light, through His sensitive body, this felt irradiation of His.

This shows us the great mystery of the union of the matter with the spirit. Even within the man who lives on earth this connection can be seen. One can see how God-the Creator has made the matter as an environment which the knowledge and the soul's feelings are communicated through. With the body's tongue one utters the spirit's meaningful words, but in a sensitive form. Through the man's ears he perceives the same words, in sensitive and spiritual mode. Through the body's material eyes are communicated and are seen, in a sensitive manner, all the spirit's meanings and feelings. And when the man mysteriously live God, his spirit is filled up with a light above his understanding, namely also above the understanding of the man's eternal life in his loving relation with God, that light is conveyed through the body too, sometimes in such a powerful sensitive form so that it envelops the body with light, as it was Christ's body on Mount Tabor, or as were Moses and Elijah, and sometimes even covers the man's body, so that the presence with the body of the one who communicates that light, it can no longer be seen." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 124-125)

"If even while they are in the present life, the believers can reflect the godlike light of the resurrected Christ, which isn't only what one can see but it is, in the first place, a content and a mode, of spiritual thinking and living, how much more will they be filled up with such a light, in the future life, after they will be united into Christ? (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 132)

"In this light identical to love, the mind is united not only with God through Christ, but the mind is united also with everybody and everything." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 187)

"The Son of God made Himself man, or He has united, within His Person, the human nature with the godlike nature, in order the human person to increase in his light and in his mystery, in connection with Christ Who has made possible our union with Him through His humanity. This increase of the human person in light and in mystery, through his connection with Christ, it takes a huge jump when the believers cross to the future life. This has been proven to us through the showing into light, nigh to Christ, on Mount Tabor, of Moses and Elijah, the first one showing us that this such a powerful light it will be received by the one who serves the Word of God while he is on earth in such a manner that he is no longer known as the one who died with the body, and the second one shows us that through the same serving he has been taken in the fire chariot, with the body, to heavens. In this sense Saint Gregory Palamas interpreted the communication of the light of Christ, as godlike source of the light of Moses and of Elijah." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 196-197)

"Christ is "felt" like a present through a luminous light which, in the same time, it also covers Him from sensitive point of view. But in the future life, given the full pneumatization of the ones who will feel Him, He will no longer be covered but He will be perceivable in a light resembling the light from Mount Tabor.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 197)

“The harmony amongst all the things and between them and the loving God, the full communion with everybody and with the Son of God made man, it will be shown as consummate light in the future life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 203)

Uncreated Divine Energies

“Through each work God produces or upholds a certain aspect of the reality, which therefore has its cause in something corresponding, but, in a not-understood sense, in God Himself. Therefore, the works which produce the attributes of the world they are bearer of some attributes which exist in a simple and not-understood mode in God. The works aren’t, therefore, but the attributes of God in movement, or God Himself, the simple One, in a movement that is on each time specified, or in multiple movements specified and united amongst them. In each of these works or energies, there is in the same time God Himself, worker, and above work and above movement. His works are through these, the ones which make obvious within creatures the features of God, by creating the creatures with analogue features, but infinitely inferior to him, and then imparting to the creatures in ever higher degrees His uncreated works or attributes.” (Stăniloae 2003: 150)

“We do not know the attributes of God except in their dynamism and to the extent we are imparted with them. But this doesn’t mean that God Himself remains passive in his simplicity and in this case the varied movement it is projected upon Him by us. From God Himself start the works which produce within world new and diverse features. But we do not know these works except through the effect they produce within world. God Himself varies for us in His works, by remaining as source of these works and being present whole in each work.” (Stăniloae 2003: 151)

“We do not experience from God, in content, except His varied work referring the world, namely in relation with us. We also know that at their basis there is the essence that subsists as personal, but how this essence is we do not know, because of being an essence above all essences. All we know from god is His dynamism lived in the relations with the world, or regarding us, a dynamism that is not submitted to any necessity, namely it is a dispassionate and totally free dynamism.” (Stăniloae 2003: 152)

“The features of God, as we know them, they unveil their richness gradually, on the measure we become more adept to be imparted with them. But as being that subsists as Person, God always remains above the features we attribute Him, although somehow, he is their source. Therefore, we aren’t wrong by considering them as existing, in their totality, in a way that is above any understanding, and through an inexhaustible simplicity in God’s being. That’s why, as dynamic manifestations of God, they are “around His Being” and not His Being Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 153)

“In God’s descent to us, He communicates in corresponding modes, something out of what he actually is, by leading us towards states which are increasingly corresponding to him. In a rational mode, under the form of the attributes, we know Him and we understand Him and we express Him in a very schematic and general manner. We know Him more concretely and more intensely out of his works. But the expressing remains inadequate; it rather uses symbols and images.” (Stăniloae 2003: 153)

“In the varied and gradual communication of His inexhaustible content, in gradually unveiling of the content of His attributes, it is shown the endless richness itself of His uncreated works. A plus of his content is imparted to us, or nuance of this content it is imparted to us through a new work or energy. An attribute appears in this sense to be the expression of multiple works which impart us with a godlike good thing that is in some measure common to these works, a godlike good this we are living it. Whether in attributes the godlike Being appears to us as descended to our understanding in a certain number of aspects, the works specify even more, or in uncountable modes, these aspect or attributes. They often make God known to us both in His general aspect descended to us and in the countless specifying they are imparted to us on every moment.” (Stăniloae 2003: 153-154)

“(…) the Same whole God is made known to us and often experienced through every work and the Same whole God makes Himself known to us, through His works, as bearer of a number of general attributes. God is good. But how many nuances His kindness has – which He shows us through countless works –, according to each moment needs, according to everybody’s needs? God manifests to us something out of His Being through His attributes, but these are specified in a huge and continuous symphony of always new acts, which bring the creation and each creature in part, towards the final target of a full union with him. Through all of them, he aims to accomplish this plan.” (Stăniloae 2003: 154)

“(…) the works of God do not appear to us as grouped only according to the attributes they activate, and impart us with, but also on sections of the plan God pursues with the creation. Through some of these works are inaugurated some new periods, through some more culminant acts which are anticipated and carried on through works related to those ones. The creation of the world is a sum of works followed by the works of the Providence, and the salvation is being prepared through a suite of works, which culminate with the Embodiment and with the Resurrection of the Son of God and it is being applied through a series of other works deriving from those ones.” (Stăniloae 2003: 154)

“The whole dynamism of the movement of the creation towards deification, it has its cause in the dynamism of the godlike works which aim to lead the creation to deification. The power for the acts starting from God, it is in God, and through that power the creation is being brought to Him. These acts do not enrich Him and do not change Him, for He is above any of His acts and above all the attributes he manifests through His acts.” (Stăniloae 2003: 154-155)

“The words referring to the works can serve also as names of the being, for the works are the being’s products. And the words can be, on one hand, new, for the works are new; on the other hand, at the basis of the words remain some fundamental words because of in the new works the world is imparted with the same divine attributes, even if in an increasingly greater depths and richness and in increasingly thinner nuances. But the mystery of the reality of God as Person, it is lived as such by renouncing to all the words which indicate His attributes and His works, which are directed towards us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 155)

“The whole life of God is act or power. All His attributes He has them from Himself, and therefore not by sharing them with somebody else. That’s why he has everything in an incomparable superior manner to the creatures; this is because all the creatures have their attributes from being imparted with His attributes, through His works.” (Stăniloae 2003: 156-157)

“(…) the attributes: life, existence, wisdom, they cannot exist by themselves except they belong to a supreme Person. But only in the relations with such a supreme Person we feel ourselves being inundated by His powers, as some power which are no longer from elsewhere, as powers which are no longer relative. This is because we do not experience these attributes or works like they would lack any support, as being by themselves in themselves, or like constituting themselves the ultimate essence. If that was the case, these powers would inundate us impersonally, involuntarily, and totally, but in the same time also in a way that is being exhausted or it annuls us. There wouldn’t be in them an incommunicable reserve, a truly infinite reserve, out of which we can receive, on the measure of our growth in the love for God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 159)

“That’s why the names of: “existence by themselves” or “life by themselves”, they indicate on one hand their support in Himself as supreme reality, and on the other hand, the fact that all these energies have their existence, or life, from the supreme Person. By being imparted with these attributes, we enter a relation with the One Who is above any relation. The support of the attributes is the One Who have them through Himself, the One Who explains all of them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 159)

“The existence from the accessible plan it is an argument for its source in the reality of the supra-existent Person Who exists by Himself. This One cannot be known and understood by through the mediation of the existence from the accessible, sensitive, and intelligible plan. But vice versa is true too. And our direct experience and knowledge they cannot reach except the existence-maker works, which sustain and fulfill the reality of the supra-existent Person, to being us imparted with the attributes manifested in these works.” (Stăniloae 2003: 164)

“All the attributes or the works of God are infinite, for He never exhausts Himself in giving these attributes as gifts, for never the creatures will reach the end of being imparted with these attributes, and for these attributes won’t ever stop irradiating out of their hypostatic supra-existential ground. But this hypostatic ground, or multi-hypostatic, it is above the infinity of the attributes, as being their source.” (Stăniloae 2003: 165)

“We live the reality of the infinite and apophatic Person, out of Who start all the existence-maker and deifying works, in a relation which is as the supreme Person wants it to be. We cannot catch and we cannot define the reality of the supreme Person, in the mode we catch, define, and experience all the degrees and the modes of existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 165)

“The supra-essence or the supra-existence of God, that is totally unknown to us in what is in itself, it manifests by entering the relation with us, and by making itself known to us, in a series of dynamic attributes. In comparison to these attributes, the world and our being manifest some corresponding attributes with a created and finite character. This is because like the finite essence of the creation cannot be explained without the supra-essence of God and without staying in connection with this supra-essence, likewise its attributes cannot be explained without the dynamic attributes of God, without their connection with the attributes of God. Moreover, the finite essence of the world and the essences the world’s essence ramifies in, they are ordered to go upwards towards an increasing participation to the divine attributes, by grace.” (Stăniloae 2003: 167)

“One of the attributes of the divine supra-essence it is the infinity. This attribute manifests in the endless works of God regarding the creation of the world, the upholding, the leading and the consummation of the world. God won’t stop, forever and ever, to deify the world. But generally, the world is enveloped and penetrated by the divine infinity, and the world cannot exist outside the connection with this infinity. To this attribute it corresponds, as attribute of our created essence, the limitation. But our limitation cannot exist except in the frame, or in the bosom, of the divine infinity, by resulting out of the power of the divine infinity, by being upheld by it – otherwise it would be exhausted – and by being appointed to participate directly to the divine infinity, and to be penetrated by the divine infinity, and without ceasing to exist as natural attribute of the created world. Always, beyond any limit, there is something more, without which that limit cannot exist and it cannot be conceived.” (Stăniloae 2003: 167)

“God gives the created things their real being and he sustains their development through His Uncreated Energies of God. In this sense, God is also Himself present in the created things, with His eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 187)

“In the relation with the created beings, God gradually actualizes His energies; God doesn’t communicate with the created beings by His integral essence, as He communicates in the internal life of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 190-191)

“On this our path towards eternity, God Himself lives together with us the waiting, and therefore the time, on the plan of His energies or of His relations with us. And this is because He Himself lives voluntarily the limitation of the offer of His love. Let’s see, for instance, the history of the revelation and of its full actualization. God lives simultaneously His eternity in the inter-Trinitarian relations, and the temporal report with the created spiritual beings; or, even in His relations with the created spiritual beings, He lives both the eternity and the time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 191)

“The endless monotony of the void and the plenitude represent the two radically differing forms of the eternity: the first one is the dead eternity, the second one is the living eternity. The time which can advance towards the plenitude of the true eternity, it is a creator time. That time absorbs life out of the infinite godlike energies, transferring that life on the created plan.” (Stăniloae 2003: 200-201)

“If the creatures would be only individuations benefiting of a created power, one could contest the existence of God as differing from nature and as having a real almightiness. But the creation participates not only in the created form to the power of God, but also in the uncreated form. This is equivalent to the direct and always new and infinite participation to the almightiness of God as Person. Only the participation by grace, to God, it proves His existence as differing from nature. From here comes the importance of the participation of the creature to the uncreated energies of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 221)

“All the forms and the stages of existence have come to existence, they persist, and they are being developed through the participation to the power of God, freely offered and offered in an indefinite variety, either as basis of the natural powers, or in the direct form of the uncreated energies. (...) In this the creation is given the possibility to grow up towards infinite, by participating to the infinite power of God, above the limits of its created power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 222)

“All along the movement, but especially at its end in God, the creatures enjoy the uncreated energies of God, namely they enjoy the consummation of their being and of their power, by participating to the godlike life fullness. The power we are given by God, it has as purpose the actualization by us, in work, of our natural power which we are given by God too, actualization which is not else but the movement we are imprinted with and which is directed by our will and by our conscience, towards God, as towards our own good.” (Stăniloae 2003: 225)

“The Divine Being, as Supreme, Unlimited, and Existing by Himself Being, He is the ultimate and inexhaustible source of all energies; He is the source of some infinite energies and therefore He is the source of any kind of created power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 232)

“The infinite energy of the divine essence is a spiritual energy. This spiritual energy is capable of overwhelming any physical power, any created power. But the spiritual energy does this gradually, through the human spirit, by gradually strengthening the power of the human spirit with his uncreated energy.” (Stăniloae 2003: 232)

“By punishing the unjust ones, God keep in some measure equilibrium in the world’s order and, by doing that, he preserves everybody’s possibility to enjoy the good things He has given on behalf of everybody. That’s why the justice from God, by being a dynamic feature, or energy, He has created the world according to the justice and He wants to bring the world back to justice, in all regards.” (Stăniloae 2003: 262)

“The ones who are imparted with the energies of God, amongst which there is the one of justice too, firstly through their being, and then by grace, through which their being is restored and strengthened, they are animated also by the impulse of accomplishing the justice. And they also urge other to do justice.” (Stăniloae 2003: 262-263)

“The revealed holiness of God is being manifested within world, through the descent of God to the world, through His uncreated energies.” (Stăniloae 2003: 265)

“The Holy Fathers saw the holiness in a great resemblance of the man to God, through the cleaning of passions and through the virtues which culminate into love. But because the cleaning of the passions and the virtues cannot be achieved except through the energy of the grace that strengthens the human powers, the resemblance means also an irradiation of the presence of God from within man. To the ones who love each other, being in a reciprocal interiority, the face of one is imprinted with the features of another, and these features actively irradiates out of him. For these godlike features are growing and they foretell their full degree through which they will overwhelm the human features, the images of the saints, still being the saints on earth, have something out of their countenance from on the plan of the eschatological eternity, through which will be fully reflected the features and will irradiate the energies of God. Through the saints it is transparent the eternal life of the age to come, the life reflected out of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 271)

“The Orthodoxy believes that through spirituality, by the penetration of the uncreated energies within world, the world is being transfigured, and this is being done also due to the efforts of the believers, who are strengthened by these energies, towards holiness. This is for in these energies, which have become of the people too, God, the One in Trinity, He makes Himself transparent.” (Stăniloae 2003: 285)

“The godlike spirit can not only to produce far greater modifications upon the energy the world’s forms are composed by, but also to produce this energy, as an effect of the godlike spiritual energy, by potentially imprinting in it the forms which will be actualized at their time, or the so called ‘rationalities’ of the things the Holy Fathers speak about.” (Stăniloae 2003: 351-352)

“Just through these penetrations into a superior horizon of the full good, we felt that this could be done peremptorily, if our spiritual powers would be unified and strengthened, if the rationality would always be united with the love. In their insufficient union, in the weakening of each one of these by their separation, in their divergence that doesn’t allow either a fully understanding knowledge or accomplishing the good without shortcomings, we feel a reserve of the sin. In Paradise, Adam was seeing with a full of love mind, with a soul filled up with the power of the godlike Ghost, not only for Adam himself was fully unified, but also for he was living in a creation full of godlike Ghost. There was no separation between creation and the world of the divine energies; there was no contradiction between the man’s tendencies and the godlike superior powers. Adam had the endless dimensions of the profoundness opened; he easily could remain on the stages of the good. The opened to infinite creation it was shunning him from narrowing, and didn’t appear to him as a narrow, closed reality; being the creation associated with the rationality, it was widening its dimensions to the full meaning, for the human existence wasn’t being cut off, in a short time, by death.” (Stăniloae 2003: 496)

“A question would be: what is the meaning of the saying from Genesis that, God has banished Adam and Eva from Paradise, in order not to eat from the ‘tree of life’ and to be alive? How could they eat out of world through ‘mind’ and to be alive, once they fell off this capacity? It didn’t cease the world, by the people's falling itself, to be a 'tree of life'? Or, didn't hide itself the 'tree of life', consequently to the falling, in the world's deep? Maybe the Genesis tries to say just this, even if it attributes it also to a special act of God. Adam and Eva fell from the capacity of seeing God, because the world became non-transparent, and because God retracted Himself from their sight. God didn't behave passively to their falling: they were removed from the 'tree of life' also because this tree was removed from their sight. The world became non-transparent and producing death and corruption not only because of the people's deed, but also by the act of God, Who withdraws some of His energies from the world. The fact that it is said that the 'tree of life' has remained somewhere the people were removed from, it might mean that the world has remained in itself a potential 'tree of life', it has remained potentially transparent, but the people have fallen from this knowledge of the world. They no longer saw the world as 'garden', as Paradise of the fullness, through which 'God was walking'; they have no longer seen the world in its signification open to the infinite of God as Person. It is meaningful that the saints, who through Christ raised themselves above the exclusive attachment to the creation, they seen in creation reliefs and dimensions, hidden from the ones who do not know anything else but the world. Saint Simeon of the New Theologian describes the order of the eternal life, which he partially saw still being him in this life, in colors of untold beauty and harmony. One can say that just the ones who get attached exclusively to the surface of the creation, they are the ones who lose the vision of the creations' depth into God, they lose the world as 'tree of life' and as goblet that can invite us to the godlike life without death, and they are outside the world like a 'garden' God walks through it, because of they persist in a world that, in addition to wheat, it brings forth 'thorns and thistles', in a world of sweats, of the pleasures mixed with pains." (Stăniloae 2003: 498-499)

"Under the influence of the Occidental theology, we have become accustomed to no longer see the union of the two natures in all its efficiency, and to consider it only as a coming next to each other, under the auspices of a hypostasis, Who, by being both man and God, he can represent us, the people, in front of God, and to satisfy, for us, the offended honor of God, or to expiate the punishment for us. Under the impression of the thesis that between different natures there cannot be accomplished a union, we have reckoned that we mustn't admit any communication between the natures. We actually must avoid both the extremity of the union of the natures to their confounding, and keeping them in the separation of the non-communication. They communicate by their energies (theandric work)." (Stăniloae 2006: 39)

"The two modes of iconographical representation of the Resurrection (representing Christ resurrecting alone – as the Occidental do; representing the soteriological and social side of the redemption work - as the Eastern icons do, t. n.), they actually are solidary with the two conceptions about the salvation in Christ. In the Occidental theology, by not having any power in Himself which to be shown in Resurrection, Christ is risen alone, from the extreme helplessness of the death, by the Father, the Father following then to attribute, to the ones who believe, a created grace, granted to Christ for His meritorious deed, but which He doesn't need. In the Orthodox theology, Christ irradiates out of Himself, or out of His body and soul, the uncreated energy, this irradiation starting even while He was in hell, and this energy penetrating the ones who hoped for His coming even before He actually came into body. Through His sacrifice, immediately after He yielded His soul on Golgotha, Christ entered not only the full communion with the Father, but also with the people, with the souls of the bodiless ones, before resurrecting His own body." (Stăniloae 2006: 71-72)

"The presence and the work of Christ Himself in Mysteries are implied by the fact that the Mysteries' grace is the uncreated energy of Christ, or His work. Through each Mystery Christ relives and he irradiates within the believer the living and the power of a state which He elevated His humanity through, at its full height and deification. Only thus can be explained the gradation of the Mysteries as well. Otherwise, the question would be raised: What aren't we given the whole grace through a sole Mystery for? Nicholas Kabasilas said: let's talk about the mode each Mystery work through for uniting the believers with Christ. First of all, for being united with Christ we must pass through the things He passed too, to endure and to suffer, us too, as many as He endured and suffered. Like the Savior received the Baptism, let's receive this Mystery first too. We grow up in our human nature from spiritual point of view, as He deigned to grow up with His human nature too. We cannot skip over the stages of our human nature's growth." (Stăniloae 1997: 17)

"God doesn't stay passive before a rationality that contemplates Him, but God communicates Himself to the man through love, by making His initiative being felt in the endless act of Self-giving. As Person, or as Trinity of Persons united in a supreme love, God is a depths of life and love which the soul wants to be increasingly more imparted with, and God communicates Himself increasingly more, the soul increasing not only in knowledge but in the whole his being, in a increasingly deeper union, in an increasingly greater likeness, in an increasingly advanced deification. God is known in light, but not theoretically, but with the whole being as mystery. God is known in His unfathomable reality as full of meaning and as source of all the meanings, for He is known as inexhaustible source of life and love. That's why God is not locked up in Himself, but He is lives in His wholeness, and still maintaining within souls a thirst for experiencing Him even more, of being imparted with Him increasingly more, but still remaining eternally indefinable conceptually, not-comprisable in His essence, an abyssal source of the love's, and power's, and life's infinity which he communicates us. This dynamic mode of communicating Himself to the creatures, without being exhausted ever as Trinity of Persons united in the borderless affection of the perfect love, it has been expressed by the Orthodox theology through the teaching about the uncreated divine energies, which God gives Himself through, wholly but always in other modes, and without exhausting Himself, and always as manifesting the same love. But God by increasingly more communicating Himself in these uncreated divine energies, on the measure of the ones who are capable of knowing these energies, not only that He doesn't ever exhaust Himself, but he also elevates us through this to knowledge, to experience and to happy states which are increasingly higher. That's why the saints will infinitely progress by being imparted with these uncreated divine energies, or in the communion with God, without them ever reaching to comprise them entirely or to get fed of Godhead, or to get bored by monotony in experiencing the godhead." (Stăniloae 1997: 209)

"The defenders of the icon didn't have too explicitly clarified the doctrine of the uncreated energies brought in creation by the Holy Ghost. This would have given them the possibility of explaining the connection between Christ and His icon, a connection which they affirm without confounding them." (Stăniloae 1997: 235)

"The full pneumatological-corporal reentering of Christ in solidarity with the world, it is a reentering through the Ghost, Whom His resurrected body is full of. This will be the event of the universal Pentecost and of supreme power. The Christ's apparition and the world's transformation it means an elevation of the world in a state transfigured by the Ghost, Who is in Christ, or a full extending of the Ghost, Who Christ is full of, upon the world. Then the Ghost will no longer work secretly within world, as He is doing now, but He will show the effect of His work in plain sight. The brightness from Tabor it will be extended upon the entire world. But this won't be the divine being, but the light and the glory starting from within the divine light as the fullness of the uncreated energies. By this, the entire creation becomes pneumatological, incorruptible, deified, transparent, though in order to become capable of such a renewal the present form of the world it must die, as it must also be destroyed the present form of the body in order to resurrect in a form capable of being a full vessel of the godlike Ghost. This will give the world an unimaginable beauty." (Stăniloae 1997: 263)

"Anyway, the Christendom believes in an eternity of the matter, of a matter unhindered transfigured by the power and by the richness of the spiritual life and by the divine energies. The Christendom admits some kind of mystical materialism, and it knows a holy matter. This is for saint is the Lord's Body of whose receiving our bodies are sanctified through. The violent, poor, and gross sensitiveness of the carnal bodies it will be converted in a sensitiveness of thin and pure feelings of the unveiling of the communion's beauties." (Stăniloae 1997: 282)

"The souls found at the individual judgment capable of communion with God, they are not locked up in a state of individual immobile contemplation of the divine essence, but they are in a state of communion with the Holy trinity and with the other souls, a communion which is way superior to the communion on earth. They see the face of Christ and they aren't isolated from one another. They praise together the glory of God and they serve together before the godlike throne; and Christ lead them to the sources of the life, namely increasingly deeper in his love out of which they sip without ever exhausting it (Apoc. 7: 9-17; 15: 2-3). This isn't a motionless contemplation, but it is a manifestation of love also from the righteous and from God in Trinity. This communion, though from now on it is a steadfast one, it wants to be increasingly deeper, fact that is characteristic to the communion. It has steadfastness for being a communion, but in the same time, also for being communion, it has in itself a movement towards an increasingly deeper stage, by being a "stabile movement", or a "mobile stability", as Saint Gregory of Nyssa and Saint Maximos the Confessor say. A leap in this movement it will be accomplished after the final judgment. The basis of this stabile movement it is the increasingly greater Self-giving of God through His uncreated energies." (Stăniloae 1997: 209)

"The word which God has created the world through, as manifestation of His will, it has however been a manifestation of power. Without God mixing anything from His power in the world's being, although, without this descent of His power in the nothingness which He has brought the world out from, the world couldn't have been produced, as also without this presence of His power around the world and even in the immediate closeness of each thing, the world couldn't have been upheld and developed. This is because without the power of God the world would have been reduced, in the last analyze, to the nothingness that has not power to uphold the world. One could say that it had been enough that God to manifest His will from distance in order the world to appear, as it is now enough Him to do in order to uphold the world and to develop it. But this will, in order to be effective related to the world, it must somehow reach as presence of power where the effect is being produced. Everywhere an effect of this power takes place, there must be present the effect producing force, of this power. Thus, each thing from the world it has, to his intimacy, the unmediated presence of a working power of God. Through this working power, each of us is, since the beginning, in an unmediated "union" with God, and due to this "union" we exist and we are developed." (Stăniloae 1992: 15)

“Where does the plus of certitude brought by faith from? Even if this plus meant an increasing of the natural evidence, it wouldn’t come out of the natural rationality’s powers, but it comes from above. The Orthodoxy applies here its doctrine about the divine uncreated energies of God. A divine uncreated energy of God penetrates our mind as a light. That’s why we said that the faith doesn’t depend only on our will, but it is eased also through its intrinsic evidence and through the power coming from above that brings this evidence, or it touches the powers of our spirit in order to notice the reality of God. But by needing to be noticed through our powers, our powers must at their turn to make an effort even if that effort is facilitated by the godlike influence. That’s why the will is needed too: not in order to create this evidence, but in order to highlight it. Through the voluntary laziness of the rationality, this evidence has been darkened; through the voluntary striving of the rationality, helped by the divine grace to overcome the laziness, this evidence is lightened again. On one hand, in faith there is an element of encounter between will and rationality, and on the other hand, the will contributes to highlighting the evidence within faith, evidence produced by grace. One grows up through another, reciprocally. By hiding Himself before the face of the man, God stimulates the man through some pressure in order the man to search for Him; and when searched, He partially unveils Himself, in order to stimulate the man even more. God puts our will in working, but without this will He doesn’t unveil Himself to us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 99)

“There is also another alternative for the Occidental Mysticism, lacking the living relation with the Persons of the Holy trinity. Founding itself on more or less rational arguments - says Koepgen in the same pages - namely on considerations from distance, that God must be a loving God and therefore he must be, at its turn, loved - this alternative becoming a feeling in subjectivity, a sentimentalism not-anchored in the unmediated experience of God. To this leads the absence, in the Occidental theology, of the doctrine of the uncreated energies which come within us, absence staying in connection with the conceiving of God rather as essence than as loving communion of Persons.” (Stăniloae 1992: 33-34)

“In the unfolding of this life there are active the energies of the godlike rationalities, towards the understanding of which we progress on the measure of our spiritualization. To the spiritual man this unfolding it is at its turn an increasingly transparent mobile symbol, to God, as it appeared to be to the prophets from the Old Testament and to the author of the Apocalypse. The time with the events from within itself, as the space with its things too, they are an environment which God works within.” (Stăniloae 1992: 188)

“It is right, that not everybody is elevated to seeing the godlike light, and the godlike light it isn’t a permanent state. To the ones who hasn’t been yet elevated there, or on the moments the ones seeing the godlike light aren’t there, the negative theology accompanied by some feeling of the godlike energies produced by prayer, it is the highest level to them. In the best scenario, they reach the apophatism of the silence or of the more intense feeling, but still in darkness, of the godlike energies, namely to the apophatism on second degree. Saint Gregory Palamas discerns between seeing the divine light, both in the negative theology - as inferior intellectual operation, as a work of the mind that cogitates those affirmative concepts having a certain intellectual content that doesn’t fit God, a work accompanied also by some apophatic feeling – and from the second degree apophatism, within which there is no intellectual operation, but it takes place the stopping of any cogitation, in the conscience of the total helplessness of understanding God with our mind and feeling Him exclusively, in darkness.” (Stăniloae 1992: 196-197)

“Here isn’t about the love that grows up with the prayer, and out of the prayer, but here is about the love as uncreated divine energy, as gift from above.” (Stăniloae 1992: 256)

“Unlike the Catholicism, which doesn’t admit uncreated energies of God and that’s why must consider the love too as a created gift, the Orthodoxy considers the love as uncreated energy, communicated by the Holy Ghost, a godlike and deifying energy, which we really participate through, to the life of the Holy Trinity. “The love comes from God” said Saint John (I, 4: 7). “But this love presupposes, according to Saint Basil, an own disposition of the created nature, a seed or a power of love within the man’s being, who is called to reach the consummation through love” (Lossky: 211).” (Stăniloae 1992: 256)

“The sight of this light cannot by any means to be framed in the conception of the pantheistic idealism (Plato, Plotinus, Hegel). This light isn’t a natural coronation of an effort of the spirit, or a consequence of the development of the spirit’s powers. One reached this light by a jump, a jump which the mind doesn’t do it by its own powers, but by being kidnapped by the Holy Ghost. So, we can say that that sight doesn’t represent only a quantitative plus in that nature in addition to the knowledge achieved by the efforts of the human spirit, but it is also a qualitative superiority, a “Ganz Anderes”, likewise everywhere the divine energies aren’t only a quantitative plus added to the energies of the created world, a plus obtained through amplification, but they are totally different, and we must deny the energies of the created world in order to take the crossing step to understanding the uncreated energies. Seeing the godlike like being a sight and a knowledge of a godlike energy, these sight and understanding being received by man through a godlike energy, they are a sight and a knowledge according to the divine mode, and the man sees and know now qualitatively, as God sees and knows, or “spiritually and in a godlike manner”, as Palamas said (The Romanian Philokalia, volume VII, p. 328), and there being possible, from quantitative point of view, an infinite progress in this knowledge about god. But one must apply to such a knowledge, in order to indicate it somewhat correctly, both positive and negative names, as to all divine energies, not to mention here the divine being. So, this knowledge has, related to the usual categories and terms, an apophatic character, but not by its minus in comparison to the usual human knowledge, but by its quantitative and qualitative plus. (...) Our helplessness of framing this knowledge in the categories and in the terms of any possible natural knowledge, it mustn't make us understand the apophatic character of this experience as unfavorable to its positive character.” (Stăniloae 1992: 291-292)

“Not even the divine energies won't be received by us in their totality, for they never cease of continuously showing themselves within us, in ever changing proportions; and in the same time with them it grows up the power manifested through us and our understanding. If during our life on earth the divine energies descend on our lowest level where we are out of spiritual point of view, by compressing their infinite treasures in a potentiality, on the measure we grow up with our ghost, they actualize some of the infinity hidden within them. And our eternal ascension is in the same time an eternal elevation of the divine energies out of the potentiality which they have been lowered at.” (Stăniloae 1992: 318)

“There is an infinite world, of infinite levels and reliefs of spiritual life. This doesn't mean that by being us in that world we won't be into God, for God is everywhere, where the environment of His energies is. But still, we won't be united with His being. Though, we will be increasingly closer to His being, on the measure we will be ever wider in our ghost in order to become subjects to some ever-increased divine energies.” (Stăniloae 1992: 319)

“The divine energies aren't else but only the rays of the divine being, shining within the Three Divine Persons. And since the Word of God has embodied Himself, the rays of the divine being has been irradiating through his human face.” (Stăniloae 1992: 319)

“One can say that the world's entities are the images of the rationalities of the divine Logos, which are in the same time energies. Through creation, God has placed in existence a part of His infinite possibility of thinking and of working, in a form specific to the level of the human understanding and doing, in order to achieve a dialogue with the people, a dialogue through which the people to ascend increasingly more towards the likeness to God and towards the union with Him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 319)

“The possibility that God, the One Who is non-comprisable and inaccessible according to His Being, to make Himself as accessible and known to the man, in creation, and in the man himself, it stays in the existence of “the things from around God”, or in the “works and powers” from around God. Even before Saint Gregory Palamas developed this thesis, the Eastern theology was aware about it.” (Stăniloae 2005: 102)

The Occidental Christian thinking, by too exclusively accentuating the transcendence of God, it didn't take in account also the fact that the transcendent God, through His embodiment, He has deified the human nature and by this He has saved all of us who enter the connection with Him through the human nature; the Occidental Christendom didn't take in account the remaining of the Embodied and Resurrected God, with us, through His uncreated energies, communicated through His human nature. The man himself, as spirit, he remained locked up to this understanding, and that's why he thought that God's greatness makes itself more felt through the imposing dimensions of the statues, or through the overwhelming sounds of the pipe organ, than through the light of the human face which God comes in the supreme intimacy of the man through. (Stăniloae 2005: 227)

“Barlaam called any power and any work of God as created, despite the fact that the Holy Fathers said that the uncreated being had uncreated powers, as the created being, it has, created powers. “But what it won't be like, says Barlaam, this light the being of God itself, if it has royal features, if it is beyond any seen of cogitated creature, if it is above understanding, if it has the existence by excellence, if it exists from ever, if it is immaterial, unchanged and subsistent? What are you saying like, that the being of God is beyond such a light?” Palamas answered that there is no being without natural work. If the God's being hadn't had a natural work, then it wouldn't have been existed. Out of the fact that the supra-being of God has a work, it doesn't turn out that God's being would be composed, for His work is non-separated from His being. Barlaam vainly accused Palamas of ditheism.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 69-70)

“Palamas said that if the godlike being hadn't had the powers of: knowledge, prescience, creation, preservation, and deification, the godlike being itself wouldn't have been either God. If the godlike being had achieved these powers later, there would have been a time when the godlike being wasn't complete, namely the godlike being wouldn't have been God. And if the godlike being has those powers from ever, then won't be only the being as uncreated, but also each one of these powers. O course, a sole being is uncreated: that of God; but none of those powers is a being. As there is only one uncreated being, that of God, and all the other beings are produced by the God's being, likewise there doesn't exist except a sole uncreated power of knowledge; all the other knowledge powers are of created nature. And, likewise it is with all the other powers." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 72)

"So, the being, above being, of God, it isn't either the created kindness, nor the life, neither the eternal glory, or either similar. The being of God exceeds all of these in its quality as cause. We call it like life, and like kindness, and the similar things, according to the works and to the powers representing it, but the godlike being remains unknown and inexpressible, as one that is simple and undivided, and it exceeds all the works." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 73)

"There are some works of God which have beginning and end. But not everything that has a beginning, it is consequently created, as Barlaam reckoned. All the works of God are uncreated. But not all of His works are without a beginning. The creator power hadn't a beginning and an end, but the creator deeds had. How could one say that the supra-existential being of God isn't something else than God's works? The omnipresence still is only a work and a power of God, as Saint Cyril said, for neither our being consists of being in a certain place. The being and the work aren't totally the same thing, though God shows Himself fully in each one of His works, due to the indivisibility of His being." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 73)

"The godlike nature doesn't have a name to express it. All the names which the godlike nature has been called with, they belong to the works. Even the godhead it is the name of a work (in Greek: to see). The godlike nature is above name. The godlike nature is even above the work expressed through the word godhead, similar to what the subject of the work is to the work like. But this isn't an impediment for venerating an only one God, as it isn't a hindrance for admitting a sole sun and the fact that its ray is also called as son." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 73)

"Saint Maximos the Confessor said that the ones letting themselves to be shared are without a beginning, while the ones received through impartation, they have a beginning. The powers springing out from the hidden that is above being, the deifying powers, the maker of being powers etc. are they the powers letting themselves to be shared, or are they the ones received through impartation? If they are the ones received through impartation, there will have to be powers of the same kind which these ones to be imparted with. And so on, infinitely. So, those powers let themselves to be shared, and they do not receive something through impartation. But it is absurd to affirm that it is given through impartation the itself being of God. And if the powers and the works of God hadn't been the ones letting themselves to be shared, but they had been amongst the ones who are imparted, they wouldn't have had anything to be imparted with except itself the being of God, and so they would have become the itself being of God.

The result would have been that the things, instead to be the effects of the godlike works, they would have been being from the godlike being, so that we would have had a multitude of godlike being. Therefore, there is the non-shareable being and the powers and the works springing out of the godlike being and which let themselves to be imparted with the things which are the effects, which are their creations; finally, these things receive through impartation those powers and those works. This is the doctrine of Saint Maximos the Confessor.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 75)

“Palamas answered: God has all of these, better said: He is above all things, unitary, and undivided. Like the soul has unitarily, within him, all the powers to take care of the body. Like the soul, even when the eyes are blind and the ears are deaf, the soul has in him the powers to take care of the body, God has in Himself the powers to take care of the world. And like the soul isn’t simply these powers of taking care, but the soul has these powers, likewise it to God. And like the soul is one, simple, and uncomposed, not being multiplies, and not being composed due to the powers from within soul and which come out of the soul, likewise God, though He isn’t only multi-powerful but He is almighty, He doesn’t lose His simplicity and His unity because of the powers from within Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 75-76)

“Itself-the-life, itself-the-Godhead (itself is added here with the meaning of life that doesn’t come from another source) and the things alike, they were called by Dionysus the Areopagite as: model, predeterminations, and godlike wishes. Could these be created?” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 76)

“Palamas said: Between the non-sharable being of God and the things, there are the paradigms from the godlike mind which the things are imparted with and which still do not exceed these ones; there are the many powers which, though, do not stand by themselves, but they stay unitarily in the supra-existential hidden. Like the center of the sky, by comprising in itself and by emitting from itself all the rays, it doesn’t cease to be one, the less ceases God to be One because of having in Himself the powers and the paradigms of all things. (This means that He has them in Himself in a concentrated and unitary manner). Those ones aren’t self-subsistent; God is their support, and not they are His support. For God is being, above being, He is untold and unthinkable, without outside relations, and non-shareable; for He is being of the things and life of the living ones and wisdom of the wise ones, he is cogitated, He is called, and He is shared by the done things. God is non-shareable, and he is shared too; he is non-shareable as He is above being, and He is shared as having life-maker power and work.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 76-77)

“Palamas took the argument for the fact that not only God is uncreated, but also His works are uncreated, from the place from Saint Maximos the Confessor, who said that the ones related to God, which let themselves to be imparted, they are without beginning.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 80)

“Saint Gregory defended himself against the accusation that he would have admitted two Gods. He admitted only that God is uncreated not only according to His being but also according to his natural works.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 80)

“The works of God cannot be created because, in such a case, he would have been created too. The Providence is the relation of God with the ones enjoying His care for them; the brightness it is the relation with the ones illuminated by Him. But the godlike nature isn’t in relation, for it is detached from all things and it is above all things (placed over all things). On the other hand, the creation doesn’t belong to the seeing power, for God saw all the things before He created them.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 81)

“Palamas affirmed that there is only one godhead, uncreated both in being and in its natural powers. The natural powers and works are indissolubly connected amongst them and with their nature. What doesn’t have natural power and work it isn’t simple, but it is inexistent. The differences between: cause and caused, between sharable and non-shareable, between characterizing and characterized, between supra-ordinated and subordinated, these differences do not impede God to be One and simple, and of having a sole and simple godhead. The Son is, according to cause, lesser than the Father, but according to the being They are One.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 82)

“Are wrong the ones saying that the powers and the works of God do not differ from His being, either those who admit that they are different but they consider them as created. They differ, but all of them are uncreated. Dionysus the Areopagite said that “the supra-existential being, for it is above being, it cannot be expressed, but only the maker-of-being emanation, that comes from the godlike principle of the existence, to the beings”. With this, and with other places from Dionysus, Palamas showed that the godlike works are uncreated and there exists “a subordinated godhead”, which is the gift given to us, from the non-shareable source of the godhead. By using quotes from: Saint Maximos the Confessor, Basil the Great, and Gregory of Nyssa, Palamas showed that the person who is deified, though he has a beginning according to the nature, he becomes without a beginning and without an end according to the grace, and this is a proof that the deifying grace is uncreated.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 82)

“The teaching upheld by Palamas it can be summarized in the following phrase: 1. There is a difference between godlike being and the godlike works; 2. But the godlike words aren’t separated from the godlike being; 3. And this doesn't alter the simplicity and the unity of the godlike being." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 133)

"The nature without power and work, it cannot exist, as there cannot be too, power and work without a being. There has never been seen a being without standing and without moving, namely without power and work. And as the state doesn't introduce the composition into being, though what stands it is something else than the state, likewise the movement, namely the work, it doesn't make the being as composed." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 133)

"The work is the manifestation of the intrinsic power, the movement of the existential power, as the sound is a movement from inside, of ours, and as such it indicates someone's nature. If the had had beginning and end in itself, then God would have been changeable. The works aren't added to God accidentally, but He has them φυσικός, in His nature. Only a contradictory note between works and being, for instance the works to be considered as created and the being as uncreated, it would impede the unity and the simplicity of God. Even if the godlike work differs from the godlike being, both in work and in being, there is only one and simple godhead. The work has all the features of the godhead. It differs not in what regards the godhead, but because one is source and the other is emanation from within Him. The difference between being and works is reduced to that that the being is cause or source, and the works are the effects of the cause, the emanations not-separated from the source. And the difference, from this point of view, it exists also between the Father and the Other Two Persons, without resulting from here that God is composed. Like the Son is the second to the Father, in what regards the order, likewise the works are subordinated to the being as well in what concerns the order or the cause, and not in what regards the nature. The difference is that the works or from within being, and not the being is from works. This report cannot be inversed. But the difference is real, because if the works hadn't been different from the being, one wouldn't have said that the works are from the being, because we do not say about two things which do not differ from one another, that they are one from another. Something else is the one who wants and something else is the will, something else is the one who works and something else is the work. The first one is the one who sets in movement, the second one is the movement. But both of them have the same nature, uncreated at God, created at creatures, and non-separated." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 133-134)

"Palamas reproached Akindynos for making God either as a being without works and therefore without powers, for the work if the manifestation of the power, or as simple work. Both these alternatives express nonsenses, impossibilities. There cannot exist being without power and work, and a work suspended in void it cannot be imagined." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 134)

“In the vision of Palamas, God manifests Himself within world through His works. The God’s being remains beyond any relation, beyond any impartation, hidden in the absolute transcendence, which we cannot reach by any means at. All the names we give to God, they do not refer to His being, that is above the meaning of any name, but those names refer to His works coming into world: the names: life, light, wisdom, God, godlike being, they do not express the hidden, unshown in the world and unshared, but they refer to the powers and to the works as: life-giver, of-being-maker, wisdom-giver, deifying, which descend to us. Only by deriving from works, we call the unknown hidden as being of God, and not in an own sense. This is according to Saint Basil the Great, who said: “His works descend to us, but His being remains inaccessible to us”. The God’s being is actually above what we call godlike being, and above principle and above godhead. God isn’t to us either an absolutely untouchable transcendence, but neither we are the product of the godlike being or united with the godlike being, nor we are knowers of the godlike being, because in such a case we would be like Jesus Christ. One cannot say about creatures that they are emanations of the godlike being, as the works are, but the creatures are the fruit of those emanations. God called these also as “the models of the things, in God”, or predeterminations, or wills. Therefore, by reckoning those works are created, you will make God Himself as created.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 134-135)

“Palamas said that God sets His creator power in movement, whenever he wants it.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 135)

“The Holy Ghost, according to the being, He is non-shareable. If, sometimes, the Ghost is named as grace too, it is named so for He is the cause of the grace; He has grace. Of, is sometimes are named the Son and the Ghost as godlike power or works, as powers of the Father, They are called like that for They accomplish the Father’s will, as One Who are the source of the powers and of the works. But there is a radical difference too, between the powers and the works as such: The Son and the Ghost are self-subsistent, whilst the last ones are not self-subsistent, they being like a train of the being. That’s why, any time the Son and the Ghost are called as power, as work, or as grace, we always understand: self-subsistent. All the works and all the powers are common to all the Three Persons. But the works and the powers aren’t hypostatical (self-subsistent), but they emanate from the Persons, in the same time not being separated from the Persons. Gregory the Theologian said that the works aren’t self-standing realities, but they are something else, and that they are set in work by that something else and also stopped by that something else. Akindynos tended to consider that what we call as godlike features or works, as: kindness, holiness, immortality etc. they would be self-standing realities, between the godlike being and creatures, as some sort of Platonic ideas, created by God, and above angels, which the angels and the creatures are imparted with. (...) Palamas considered this as an absurdity, as a mythological confusion: “What could self-stand like, the holiness and the kindness?” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 136)

“It is rightly so, that the being of God hasn’t left any trace in the created things, and that’s why one cannot find a proper name for naming the God’s being. The names we give to the godlike works, they refer to the aspects we think at, related to God. But these has been existing before the world has been created, and we named them while they have been already existing. Neither Gregory of Nyssa nor Maximos the Confessor said: “the things so-called as around God”, but they said: “the thought things”, in order to show that they actually exist. They aren’t the being of God, for the being of God cannot be submitted to the process of thinking, neither the being of God is multiple.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 154)

“The will and the sight of all things by God, before the things existing, that doesn’t constitute the nature itself of God, but they constitute a divine relation. The godlike being is above all relations. But the relations too, they are uncreated. This is for only the God’s being had been uncreated, it would have followed that the seeing power, which is from ever existing, it would have been created as well.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 155)

“We know, said Palamas, that these names, though not expressing the godlike nature, they still aren’t empty words. They aren’t empty, not only the positive words, but the negative words aren’t empty too. They express and they present the ones which are contemplated as being natural at God, and through them they present the almighty God, as being unshown.

Amongst the said things, some of them aren’t but they are said to be, other are but they aren’t said to be. Of what kind are these ones? Obviously, they are amongst the ones which are. And what it is, if it is self-standing and it isn’t contemplated in something else, then it is nature. And the ones which are contemplated in something else, they belong to that natural something else, and other are accidental. But to God belongs nothing accidentally. So, all the ones belong to God in a natural mode.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 155)

“Nothing we say about God it refers to God’s being, but it refers to the ones deriving from His being, as Damascene said (f. 251 r.). The names we give to God aren’t empty words, but they express the godlike works, though not in the plenitude of those works.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 155)

“The sky and the earth aren’t works of God with the meaning of actions, but they are the result of some of His works, they are masterpieces. They aren’t εργεiai but they are εργηματα.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 156)

“Palamas said that it is wrong not to discerns between what characterizes and what is characterized. And the difference mustn’t be considered a necessarily indicating another being. If there hadn’t been any difference between the Son and the Father, than they would have been confounded to One Another. “But, said Palamas, we have taught that both the uncreated being is characterized through the uncreated work, and the uncreated work isn’t alike the uncreated being – for, what could have been possible like, to characterize something unlike it – but they are different from one another, for, otherwise, what could have characterized the uncreated work” (f. 257 r.). We do not know God in His being, but we know Him from His works which characterize Him. As Basil the Great wrote in the Epistle towards Amphilochius: “We know God from His works. This is for His works descend to us, and His being remains unapproachable”. God has these works, He being something else than His works and His works being something else than Him, and uncreated. These are” the Providence, the emanations, the endlessness, the unchangeability, the simplicity, the non-having-a-beginning (the principle), the wisdom, the power, and the ones alike, they being something else than the being of God, but uncreated. This is for something else is what has and something else and different it is what is possessed.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 156-157)

“Palamas said: If there isn’t any difference between the one who has and what is possessed, when we will say that God has will, power, and wisdom, we will say only that God had God, God, and God, and when we will say that the Father has the Son and the Holy Ghost, we will confound the Three Hypostases.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 157)

“And earnest of this state of surpassing or of overwhelming the space with the enlightened body, it was shown by Christ after His resurrection, to the Apostles. Without becoming omnipresent by nature, the body of Christ appeared in diverse places, without needing to travel the space as before His resurrection. He exceeds spiritually, or through the Holy Ghost, as source of the whole uncreated godlike energies, the spiritual distances, as the light making the material matter of the entire body as luminous light, not only on the basis of the fact that the whole material matter is luminous light, but also through the culminant spiritualization of His body, This light, to us for now, it covered His body, without annulling His body, but making His body to appear at His will, whenever and wherever He wanted. He entered through the locked-up doors, and “He was with His disciples always, not by coming, but rather by showing Himself whenever He wanted” (Saint Gregory Palamas, Word at The Ascent of the Lord, G.P. 151, col. 286 C). The fact that Christ, before His ascent, He was everywhere with His disciples, and that after His ascent he comes and dwells with His body (at Eucharist), in anyone who believe in Him, it is something else than extending His body within the whole space, or a spatial ubiquity. It is rather a presence of spiritual depth and height, which can become sensitive on different degrees of intensity, according to the degree of power of spiritual perceiving, or of faith, of the one who, by receiving the Holy Ghost, he opens himself to Christ and, by doing that, he “sees” Christ and he “feels” Christ within himself. This presence is felt, by the ones who believe, even in other fellow humans, and sometimes even around themselves.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 197)

“The work which God creates the universe through, and which He uphold and consummate the universe through, by bringing the universe to Himself, are forms of the uncreated kindness. And their masterpiece can be both the created universe and the universe’s created gifts, and the uncreated gifts of the universe’s deification, and therefore referring to the universe too. By this, it is proven that God’s kindness isn’t locked-up only within Him, in the relations amongst the Three Persons, but it also is directed towards existences other than God, and God creates other existence without being forced, by this, to limit His kindness. The possibility of endowing the created universe with the uncreated gifts, it shows the God’s almightiness, which He has created the universe through, out of nothing, and His limitless kindness; but this shows also a conformity of the created universe, with God, once the universe can use the uncreated gifts from God, or once the universe can be made as transparent to God’s uncreated works, and once the created persons are made as subject of other works, together with God Himself, by being the created beings’ life elevated at the height of God’s life, and at the height of really knowing and living God’s life, in a dialogue of full intimacy. The possibility of God to endow the created universe with the uncreated gifts, it extends a bridge between the uncreated God and the created universe, but it also shows that God has created the universe as capable of comprising in itself, the God’s uncreated life. This shows again the limitless kindness of God Who crosses over the differences between created and uncreated. The possibility of this godlike kindness it is implied even in the fact that, through uncreated works, God can give birth to a created universe.” (Stăniloae 1995: 25-26)

“The universe is being imparted with God. Here we have another paradox: the universe has been created by God, out of nothing, but on the other hand, the universe is imparted with God’s power, but without this power to become, to the universe, a created power, or an own natural power. Other uncreated and non-creator powers of God, they become characteristic to the universe, since the universe has been created capable to become a support of those powers too, and not according to the universe’s will, but by grace, as continuously the universe giving itself, as gift, to God, or as always having its departure point into God, by God’s will. Saint Gregory Palamas said: “Rightly, all the things are imparted with God, but there is a very big difference between this impartation and the impartation of the being... This difference is sufficient to show us that only the impartation of the ones living in a godlike manner, it is uncreated” (Quoted Work, p. 213, About Participation, cod. Paris, 1238, f. 206 v.).” (Stăniloae 1995: 27-28)

“The gradual enrichment of the human creature with the uncreated godlike powers, after the human creature has been created and endowed with created powers also through an uncreated power, requiring also the willing coworking of the free and conscious human person, it makes the time as necessary. So, the time too, it has as premise the existence of the godlike as Person, having the power of using wanted works, works which differ from His being, works appropriate to the quality of the created person, but the human person’s growth requires a free coworking of that human person.” (Stăniloae 1995: 33)

“The extended specifying of the difference between the being and the works of God, done by Saint Gregory Palamas, it helps us to understand the active and always renewed presence of God in the temporal development of the creation, without us considering that as a changing of His unchanged being. If God uses His works by His will, He can change His works in relation with the temporal universe that is changeable in its being, though God remains unchanged according to His being, and His works constantly aim to attract the human being into good, for the good is characteristic to His being. God shows this freedom of using the works, for He exists like Person. God uses other and other work, according to each situation and according to the universe’s need as a whole, or to those of the singular persons, but He remains with His being in the same absolute power and love, relatedly to the universe and to the conscious and free persons from within universe. This is for God always wants their good, according to His being, and He helps the human beings to advance into good, accordingly to the changing situations which the persons cross through, in the changing environment of the present universe. In God there are all the possibilities of manifesting and of communicating the good, and He chooses those accordingly to the changing situations which the creatures are in. This could explain, up to a point, even the bringing to existence of the time, or of the changing creatures, by the Eternal and unchangeable in His being God, and endless in His possibilities of manifesting the good, for the good is within His being like in a source. This could explain even a connection of the time to the eternity of God, without implying His being’s unchangeability. If the universe had existed from eternity, it wouldn’t have been a masterpiece of God’s will, and there wouldn’t have been any difference between universe and God. And the universe’s insufficiencies would have had their causes in God’s being. Namely, the evil would have been sourced by God’s being. The time and the universe aren’t from eternity. By this, it is avoided the eternity of the insufficiencies and of the evil, and it is avoided also to be those attributed, to God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 43-44)

“The trust the man has in the fact that his temporally determined requests are listened to, by God, it is based on that possibility of God to take in account the temporal and changing moments of the human being, without God changing His being by that, namely without entering Himself a temporal development. God takes the time in account, but without Himself being submitted to time, as only the human being is. If God has mercy on a human being, and not only by and large, but he has mercy on the concrete human being in a concrete situation, God will live Himself those temporal concrete situations of each human being, but God does that in the light and with the power of His eternity. In the fact that God can listen to and He can fulfill concomitantly the various requests of a great multitude of people, He shows too, His limitlessness and His almightiness, namely a limitlessness and an almightiness out of which He puts in work what he wants and how much He wants, on each time, and for each person who obeys God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 46-47)

“The One Who is in Himself above the time, he meets the temporal creatures through His energies.” (Stăniloae 2003: 178)

Union with God
/ with Fellow
Humans

“The unity he accomplishes in himself and with God, in Christ, the man extends it, through his effort, to the reports he has with his fellow humans too. The lines the people follow are tied in a continuous and increasingly tighter communication that ascends towards the same source and target. All the people reach a supreme simplicity and union in the divine simplicity. But this simplicity equals the supreme plenitude. God and all the created things will have a unique simplicity and plenitude.” (Stăniloae 2003: 176)

“The plenitude we tend to, it is above the duality between present and future, between virtues and knowledge, between good and truth. By having everything in God, we will no longer tend towards another target. We will be even above the difference between divine and human, as Saint Maximos the Confessor says. This is because the believer who reached in God, he no longer is different from God, although according to their nature the creatures remain different from God, and amongst them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 176-177)

“The believer aspires towards the unity of towards the relation with a Person Who has the unity with all the people. God wants, at His turn, to accomplish this intimate unity of all the people. In Christ this unity it has been accomplished de facto, by meeting and by fulfilling the divine will of unification with us with the human thirst of union with all the people in the unifying divine center of everybody.” (Stăniloae 2006: 21)

“Nicodemus the Hagiorite discerned three modes of the union, or of the communion: the one according to the being, characteristic of the divine Persons, the one according to the work (to the energy), characteristic to the union of God with the people from before the Embodiment, and the one according to hypostasis, characteristic to the godlike nature and to the human nature in the Hypostasis of Christ. The full union with God it cannot be accomplished except in the last-mentioned mode. If the union had been through being, it would have meant the transformation of the human nature into divine nature, and that is not possible. The union through energy (through work), that one between people – before Christ – it was a union through relation, that kept God outside the humanity, and it didn’t protect the humanity against sin, or against estrangement.” (Stăniloae 2006: 21)

“The union through relation, of God with us the people, into Christ, it is a relation through the community of the human nature, but also through a certain communication between the divine nature and the human nature which are united in Him. This is a direct relation, established thus, between God-the Word and us, the people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 21)

“In the unifying power of the Word it stays the whole power that unites the creatures and leads them to increasingly more unity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 21)

“Therefore, a free Person, the Person of God-the Word, he explains everything. He gives everybody the possibility of subsisting in a unity, in His unity. By this is explained the maximum unity accomplished in Christ, or the fact that God-the Word has made, on Himself, the Hypostasis of the human nature. It is characteristic to the divine Hypostasis of the Logos to be, especially, freely, the hypostasis of the human nature, and it is characteristic to the human nature called to the state of hypostasis, to have as its ultimate hypostasis the Hypostasis of the Word, given the fact the human nature is created in His image.” (Stăniloae 2006: 21)

“In the Epistle towards Ephesians, Saint Apostle Paul shows the direct dependence of the Christians’ increasing in the union with Christ, on the work of: the Apostles, the Prophets, the preachers, the shepherds, the teachers, in building up the body into Christ, in Who is done “” the consummation of the saints”, “until all of us will reach the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, at the state of the consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ” (Ephes. 4: 11-13).” (Stăniloae 2006: 143)

“Christ, or the Ghost of Christ, He has made Himself the subject of the man’s feeling, of the man’s prayers, of the man’s words, and of the man’s deeds. But also vice versa, the man is the subject of the feelings of Christ’s body. It is a union without confounding. But the ones who doesn’t fully fulfill the commandments of Christ, but only one of them and only partially, he hasn’t fully died for Christ and he hasn’t fully united himself with Christ, because he doesn’t fully love Christ, though that man too, still can enter the kingdom, namely he can accede to the tasting of a partial communion with Christ, on the measure of his union with Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 149)

“Our consummation or our union with God isn’t only a target, but it is also an endless process. Although, on this road one can distinguish two great stages: one, of the advancing towards consummation, through efforts for purifying of passions and for achieving the virtues; and another, of always advancing life in the union with God, in which the man’s work is replaced by the work of God, the man giving rather his receptivity, or his openness in order to be filled up with increasingly more godlike life.” (Stăniloae 1992: 6)

“If the target of the Christian life is mysterious life, of union with God, the road towards will comprise the ascension towards this peak. As such, this road, on one hand it differs from that peak, and on the other hand it stays with that peak in an organic bond, like climbing the mountain it stays with the mountain’s peak.” (Stăniloae 1992: 7)

“The mysterious union with God, which the ascesis will lead us to, it doesn’t stay at somebody’s will on anytime. The union with God is something totally different from the states of confuse affectivity, which someone can transpose into whenever he likes, or which can come upon someone randomly. After walking the ascetic road, in which each moment is placed, not without rationality, at its place, the mind must cross through the stage of knowing the “rationalities” of the created things, as Saint Maximos the Confessor said, and only after he has crossed through this phase too, impropriating the created rationalities and surpassing them, he enters the light of the mysterious union and knowledge. For this phase of knowing the real rationalities and of surpassing these rationalities it is strung out too on the ladder of the ascesis, it is obvious that the mysterious union with God, placed at the end of this ascension, it isn’t something irrational, but it is something supra-rational, or it isn’t a state achieved consequently to a debility of the rationality and of ignoring the things’ rationalities, but it is achieved consequently to exceeding all the rationality’s possibilities, which is brought to its supreme force and nimbleness, as also consequently to completely knowing the rational meanings of the things.” (Stăniloae 1992: 11-12)

“The Christian union with God it accomplishes the true meaning of this union. But this meaning it is perverted where one tends to identification between man and God, respectively to an actualizing in conscience of an identity which would have existed previously, as substance, as in case of all the pantheistic religions and philosophies.” (Stăniloae 1992: 13)

“The Christian teaching though, it is totally stranger to any tendency of the pantheistic identification of the man to God. Despite all of these, the Christian teaching courageously affirms the possibility of a man’s “union” with God, of an unmediated “seeing” of God, of “participation” to God, by grace.” (Stăniloae 1992: 14)

“We must insist upon the Christian meaning of the “union” with God and of “seeing” Him in an unmediated manner, as also upon the possibility of this mysterious fact. Of course, we aren’t going to analyze here the culminant moment of this union, but for this moment is anticipated also in less intensive degrees also on the previous levels of the Christian life lived in awe ghost, we are going to only highlight here mainly the meaning and the possibility of a unmediated contact with the godhead. This is for once being proven the possibility, in principle, of such a union, no matter the contact’s intensity, it is implicitly proven also the possibility of the “union” with God on the peaks from beyond the limit of the human powers.” (Stăniloae 1992: 14)

"The Christendom considers any other union with the godhead, namely a union not accomplished through Christ and into Christ, it is an illusion. This is for Jesus Christ is the only "Mediator", Who has given God to the people, as ladder towards Himself. "Through Himself he deigned to reconcile all the things with Himself, either those on earth or those from heavens, making peace through Himself, through the blood of His cross" (Col. 1: 20). For in Him we have, all of us, closeness to the Father" (Ephes. 2: 18)." (Stăniloae 1992: 38-39)

"One cannot reach the union with God except through the clean prayer. "The virtue of the prayer works the mystery of our union with God, said Saint Gregory Palamas; for the prayer it is the bond of the rational beings with their Maker" (About Prayer, G.P., 150, 1117). But the union with God is above even the clean prayer. The union with God means perfect love. And this perfect love cannot be given by the man but it comes from God." (Stăniloae 1992: 254)

"Even before being in state of clean prayer, the man must have cleaned himself of passions. But the cleaning of passions is one with the growing up of the love for God. Thus, the love from God by dripping in advance in our soul, it strengthens our soul in the quietude of the dispassion and in the clean prayer. And by these there comes within him even more love. Better said, now is working within him only the godlike love, or the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1992: 254)

"The great mystery of the love it is the union accomplished amongst themselves by the ones who love one another, without being they abolished as free subjects. The connection established by love it doesn't consist only of the fact that the ones who love one another they think at each other with pleasure - namely of the orientation of each ones' intention towards another - but in the fact that each one receives the other one within himself." (Stăniloae 1992: 260)

"We will be partakers to the perpetual ecstasy only in the eternal life. Only then we will exist the discursivity, only then we will be partakers to that uninterrupted essential penetration of us by the divine subject, as also by the human subjects, and we will be partakers to an eternal substantial knowledge, to a union with the intimacy of the divine and human reality itself." (Stăniloae 1992: 273)

"We have to clarify what - through our union with the Absolute Person, or with one or another of the human subjects, union obtained through love - it is achieved the union of the whole human nature like, obtained through love, amongst all the individual, and the union of the human nature with God? This is for it was affirmed by the Holy Fathers. Saint Maximos said that firstly the love unified the individual man, by removing the anger, the cunningness, the greediness, and all the other things which the man has been divided in, through the bodily love for the self. This is for no longer being those, there cannot last any trace of evilness; they are replaced with the virtues which make the love's power whole again. And, through this unification of the individual man it is accomplished the unification of the human individuals as well." (Stăniloae 1992: 273)

"How have we become through love as "a sole man", united with God? At least as long as we live on earth, we cannot experience directly in time the love as short ecstatic state, except in relation either with God or with one of our fellow humans; and such it is the consummate union achieved by it. Especially the ecstatic love for God in the mental prayer absorbs us so much than we forget about people, a thing that doesn't happen so exclusively on the moment of the ecstatic love for our fellow human. This is because in the last case, in the absorbing contemplation of our fellow human, we realize that in connection with his subject's indefinite it stays the divine indefinite. So, it is directly achieved by this the union between us and God as well. But we do not experience on the moment of this ecstatic love for God, or for one of our fellow humans, and actual union with all the people." (Stăniloae 1992: 274)

"The positive role in the experience which the mind receives after the stopping of the mental activity, it is presented by Saint Gregory Palamas and by Dionysus the Areopagite, by the fact that they attribute to it, in addition to the power of the natural activity directed towards the created things, also the power of entering the union with God, of accepting the union and of feeling the spiritual union with God. Of course, the feeling of this work is owed by the mind to the godlike work dwelling within mind. But an object couldn't impropriate this spiritual feeling operated by God. The mind has the capacity of impropriating the godlike spiritual work as it would be of itself, namely the mind is capax divini, and this capacity has become actual out of virtual, through the cleaning of the passions." (Stăniloae 1992: 278)

"Even within mind there is a tendency of surpassing itself, namely of being surpasses the mind's natural activity directed towards the real things and of being united with the One Who cannot be understood through this activity. Even if achieving this surpassing or this union it cannot actually be done by the mind by itself, because of not being able to have by its nature both a natural and a supra-natural activity, God, by elevating the human mind to the union with Himself, he still uses this capacity of the mind. (An icon: the human organism need air, but the air isn't produced by this need of the human organism; but without the organism's need for air, the air will vainly attempt to penetrate the man)." (Stăniloae 1992: 279)

“While the created being irradiates light, how much brighter will be the light irradiated by the divine being, inexhaustible in existence and in perfect Trinitarian communion. His perfect union and His infinite being, lived by the perfect love amongst the three Persons, it irradiates light not only amongst Them (“light out of light”), but also towards the conscious created beings, but this is a light that can be seen only by the ones who, through the prayer and through the cleanness of the love, they ceaselessly ask for Him to unveils Himself to them in love; this is for this sight means also the culminant union in love with the Trinitarian communion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 294)

“The coming back of the human being, through love, in the report of intimacy with God, based on the original kinship, it takes place in the same time with the unification of the human being in himself. And this fills the human being too, with light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 294)

“The smile of God and the smile of man, when God and the man encounter one another in the love’s ecstasy, these smiles fill everything up with light. That’s why the encounter with God is experienced as light. Only when we do not have this unmediated experience of God, our mind conceives concepts as surrogates to this experience. But the one who takes a concept of God as the reality of God, he makes an idol to himself. And the result is his spiritual death, as Saint Gregory of Nyssa interprets the word: “Won’t the man see My face and to be alive” (Exod. 33: 20).” (Stăniloae 1992: 294-295)

“In the resurrected Christ won’t be united only the human persons into light, but the whole space will be enlightened by Him. This is for, if Christ makes the ones who believed in Him close not only to Him but also amongst themselves, having Him in their middle, how couldn’t Him be in the future life in maximum closeness to each human person who believed in Him and how couldn’t Him bring close, to Him and to one another, all the ones who believed in Him?” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 197)

“Who could have made me to totally have the one whom I love and who loves me, with the whole his transcendence towards others, if That One hadn’t been God, Who I find united in a total and unique manner, with each human being?” (Stăniloae 1995: 102)

“In the endless advancement of this living of the union with the Person-Absolute, it is again implied the fact that the human being is made for eternity. The human is the being who becomes increasingly aware of the presence of God within universe, who ascertains and makes increasingly real and increasingly visible the presence of the infinity of His power and love within universe, starting from seeing and from intensifying them, within himself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 144)

“Now the creator Word Himself Who has in Himself His creator power too, He has made Himself man and He has entered the dialogue of the direct and deifier communication, with the human beings, which is by that also a communication of continuous power. This is for He remains in this communication even when he is not seen, by being forever man of the same being with us, according to humanity, but He is ubiquitous God. By taking our humanity in His Hypostasis forever, He intimately connected Himself with the people, as any man with his fellow humans. By that, God unites the whole creation with Himself in His Hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 1995: 164-165)

“The death of Christ, borne within us, it is a transcendence of ourselves towards the Person-Absolute, and it means our liberation from slavery. The higher transcendence has been accomplished in Christ’s humanity. This is said by the words: “And He sat on the right hand of the glory’s throne” (Hebr. 7: 1) in the Holy of the Holies. And only in the union through the faith in Him, union made possible by our union, according to the nature, with His humanity and, therefore, also the brotherly love communicated to us, we too have, the possibility of a full transcending.” (Stăniloae 1995: 195)

“Saint Gregory of Nyssa affirmed, on the other hand, the unchangeability of the movement from good, when he spoke about the stable movement or about the mobile stability of the ones who are advanced in consummation. And if there is an eternal stability of the consummate ones, why wouldn’t be there a motionlessness in the agitation in evil, of the ones who remained callous in evil? That is a motionlessness that isn’t, though, a resting. This shows us the resurrection into happiness as a peak of the human whole, as a raising from the relativity of a continuous discontent and as a fulfillment of the fundamental aspiration that dominates the human being. And the resurrection into unhappiness, it is shown us as a dissatisfaction, without the hope of getting rid of it. But the resting in the real peak of the happiness, it isn’t a petrification, but it is a mobile stability, as also a continuous joy in tasting the same infinite love, or in the happy love of the same infinitively loving Subject. The consummate love is both eternally stabile and eternally mobile, for it is alive and it gives life, for the ones who loves he is continuously alive in manifesting his love for another, and he is increasingly alive in the plenary communication with the beloved one and the beloved one is always alive in the endless love shown to him.” (Stăniloae 1995: 199-200)

“This culminant happiness in communion with the embodied and resurrected as man forever Son of God, and with all the human being united in this communion, it cannot take place without the maximum and all-clean spiritual transparency of the bodies, namely without their consummate spiritualization, which the bodies’ transparency is an effect of. The love, the spiritual transparency of the bodies, transparency providing in the same time, the complex integrity of the human being a life, and the spiritualization equal to an untold spiritual enrichment and deepening, they all belong together.” (Stăniloae 1995: 199-200)

“Into Christ, the humanity has accomplished and it is accomplishing its aspiration to transcend to the fullest union with God, the Person-Absolute. For this, it was necessary that the union with Him to be accomplished in three modes:

- a) For the fact that the human had been united with the humanity in a sole Hypostasis, the Hypostasis of the Son of God, the human being, by uniting themselves with Him as with a man too, they united themselves in Him with the Son of God Himself, becoming, forever, sons of the heavenly Father;
- b) The Son of God united Himself with a Virgin, taking His humanity as clean of sin, and totally open spiritually, to God;
- c) The people unite with the Son of God made man, as distinct persons, as they have been created by God, non-confounded either to God or amongst themselves.

These are the three modes of human’s transcending to the union with God, the first two being preparatory conditions to the third one.” (Stăniloae 1995: 202)

“By advancing into Christ, each of us, endlessly, in the communication with the others and in the endless communion with the Holy Trinity, the man advances, as well, in his own unity, but without annulling his contrastive components. The supreme model for this unmixed and unconfounded unity, we have it in Christ in Who the humanity is united with the godhead in a single Person and without being confounded. Christ is the attraction center of the union, an ever-fuller union of the human components, of the people with one another, and of the people with God. This is the direction of man’s continuous transcendence, which tends to an ever-tighter union amongst all the human components: soul and body; created being and united with the uncreated God; person taken individually and communion; limited and undefined person; human being and nature; and human being imprinted by the passing temporality and also destined to eternity, having right by now the earnest of the eternity. The full unity consists of the unconfounded unity of everybody in God, having at the basis the faith in a God in Trinity, creator, upholder, and guide of everyone, towards Himself, through One from Trinity Who has made Himself man.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 37)

“To Christendom, all the existing things are created by God, namely they are brought to existence by the will and by the power of The Uncreated God and as such, they aren’t created in order to be in an opposition to Him, or amongst themselves, but they are created in order to be united, in freedom, increasingly more, amongst themselves and with God. If there appears the fight amongst them, and if some of them really oppose their Creator, this thing will be contrary to the good and to the truth. The good and the truth consist of everybody's union with one another and with their Creator. All the things created tend towards union amongst themselves and with God. The conscious beings must tend towards this, by recognizing their eternal value, for they are made out of the love of the same God, and they are summoned to consummate themselves during this life, in their love for God and for one another, each human being bringing a contribution to the reciprocal enrichment and they being maintained as unconfounded unique beings. Their union with God and amongst themselves it is a double union which one cannot advance except simultaneously in. Not the fight stays at the origin of the things and of the persons, and not the fight is our eternal way of existence, but at the origin of all things there stays the love God-Person for all of them, and this is seeded within their beings as a target to be aimed by them. Such a movement of continuous transcendence it has been reckoned by Saint Dionysus the Areopagite as characteristic to the angelic groups. But he didn't see in their continuous ascension towards God also an ever-tighter closeness amongst them, but still without being confounded to one another." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 37-38)

"The Christendom recognized the necessity for a struggle, but it is about a struggle for unity, for convergence, for transcending together towards the spring and the center of everybody, a struggle against the locking-up in pride, in egotism, in the bodily unilaterality, or in reducing the experience to the material and bodily things. We admit the necessity of the struggle against the tendency of eliminating some components of the existence, the need for a struggle in order to embrace everybody. It is the necessity for a struggle mainly against the own egotism. By this it is promoted the true good, namely the good which promotes the everybody's existence in harmony." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 38)

"The true transcendence cannot be without convergence or without communion. Only through both of these, the man advances towards the Absolute Trinitarian Persons, Whom the man is thirsty for. By both of these it is accomplished the plan of the God in Trinity Who created the pluri-personal mankind not for fighting in itself, but in order to be accomplished the increasingly fuller union of the mankind, and of the mankind with God, with the will of the mankind too, and by this in order to actualize the mankind as a pluri-personal deified mankind, not being like that the mankind by itself, but by grace, in order God to be Unifier in all things." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 38)

"The mankind cannot raise to its quality except by continuously transcending towards the Person-Absolute from Who are coming and in Who are called to gather together all the contrasts which constitute the human being and the creation. Transcending towards the Person-Absolute brings the man to an ever-higher spiritual height and, together with that, to an ever fuller peace and unity and to an ever-brotherly peace and unity between him and his fellow humans. This is for to the extent that transcendence takes place, the creation becomes increasingly transparent to God and God is increasingly seen and increasingly efficient through creation and, by that, it unifies the man, and the man with his fellow humans in Him, as creator Source of all things.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 56)

“The self-transcending of each person it is the only one that can lead to stopping the fighting amongst people. But this is equal to the cross of the restraint.

Only through this transcendence, the man is increasingly more elevated in his quality as true human being, exceeding the inferior contrasts with the superior ones, and making everything shining in the first contrasts too, the unifier light of the Absolute. The target which the man is called at, it is the endless transcendence, this being his internal and essential requirement of the man. This makes the man increasingly unitary, but it also keeps him as multiple and it makes him increasingly richer. Through grace and effort, the man is elevated increasingly higher, towards the true man. This is for these things make the man to be increasingly transparent to the beauty of his Prototype. The created human increasingly becomes spirit, and it becomes increasingly transparent to the Uncreated, and the man’s body becomes increasingly transparent to his spirit, instead of becoming dark and opaque cover to the spirit and against God.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 56)

“Like the limitless existence gives His conscience the limitless joyfulness, likewise the limited existence is reflected in a limited joy. And that’s why, the limited existence continuously tends to a greater joy, in union with the plenary existence. Even this aspiration shows the created beings’ awareness about the existence of a plenary existence united with a plenary joyfulness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 8)

“The fact that the human nature didn’t constitute within Christ as a human person, it is very significant. The Son of God, by making Himself as hypostasis of the human nature, he has given the human nature the function as environment of the love of God, love directed towards all the people, and love of the Only Begotten Son, in human form, for the Father., the Son making Himself the most loving man of the heavenly Father, and from within Christ this love can irradiate towards all the people, in order to make them too, as able of His godlike love in human form, for the Father, and amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 1995: 71)

“Christ’s words, by expressing His state of consummate man, they are also meant to help us to elevate ourselves on a spiritual level resembling to His one, corresponding to His state of Resurrection. For in Him it is shown the consummate connection between the highest spiritual level and the superior level of the nature's laws which lead to death. The Resurrection is the effect of the supreme spiritual level reached by the mankind into Christ in union with the Godhead." (Stăniloae 2003: 37)

"Where Christ is, there is unity; this is for, where Christ is, there is the love that wants to embrace everybody in Himself and to present them to the Father. That's why the unity cannot be achieved except through the rooting into Christ Who is the Word of God Who has become accessible to us through embodiment, in order to gather us again into His unity. The division is the sign of the getting out from this unchanged and unitary foundation, and it is the sign of the attachment to the changing and various temporality as it would be the sole reality. The division is the struggle of everybody against everybody, or the fight of each one against many, in order to grab as many as possible of the things due to them. Who feels himself in God, still being in this life in the world, he doesn't feel lonely, for he know the world as being of God and the world has become transparent to him and he sees God through the world's transparence, and he sees the things' rationalities gathered in an undifferentiated unity in Christ - the godlike Logos Whom he is united with." (Stăniloae 2006: 107)

"The Church's unity isn't a unity of institutional order, neither is crumbled in individuals with different beliefs, or with different interpretations of the faith, but it is a unity of ontological-spiritual life in Christ and in His Holy Ghost. This unity with Christ and into Christ, it is not bases only on affirming a common faith, which can have a subjective character, but it is experiences in the identical power that comes to the believers and to the Church from Christ, Who is within the Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

"The Church is unitary for, by having Christ working within it, the Church truly is His extended body, and namely the Church if fully united with the Head and it is fully united in itself. If a Church doesn't have Christ within, in this integral and intimate mode, and which reckons the Christ is so diluted within it than it is necessary to have a vicar, that Church won't be fully united with Christ and neither will be one in itself and in its interior. Let aside the total lacking of unity of the Church, where Christ is even more absent from within it, not existing there a experiencing of the whole Christ, and therefore not existing except a faith mostly without consequences for life and interpreted in all sorts of forms as many individuals there are; there is no longer confessed a seen Church, and if there is not a seen Church there won't be possible to exist either a real Church. This is because if the Church's members do not know one another, it won't be possible to be consciously united and they won't be able to develop this unity. But the Church is the union of the ones who believe in Christ, and not only the union with Christ of some individuals taken individually.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“The Church is unique in the full meaning of the word Church. This is for the Christian formations, which do not have Christ intimately dwelling within them neither they can be the body of Christ nor His bride. Besides this, Christ cannot have several bodies organically extended out of His body as person, and neither can He have more than one bride. Any full union of the believers with Christ cannot mean but an intimate, integral, and working presence of His, within their bosom. And only this union is the Church in the full meaning of the word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“If the ecumenical movement tend to reestablish the church’s unity, it will be necessary to tend towards the most intimate presence of Christ in the believers’ bosom. But the degree of the most intimate working presence of Christ in its bosom it is confessed and experienced by the Orthodox Church, which has preserved the life tradition of the early Church. The Christianity cannot reach the unity of the Church except by reaching the unity as body of Christ, at maximum united with the Head, or by reaching the supreme love relation with Christ, characteristic to his bride. Without accepting the intimate unity with Christ, one won’t be able to reach either the unity of the Church in itself, as unitary body and as unique bride of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

“Even more than this, the meeting moments of the two intimacies, also made the fellow human to withdraw from sin. The meeting of the two intimacies it is accomplished just through this: that this meeting makes the fellow human also to detach himself from the confusion of the sin. Somehow, the intimacy of the man, his center, it remains outside sin, but the sin throws the forgetfulness over it, and it covers it with fog²⁵⁵. Even if it would not be so, in any case, the retrieved intimacy of the man it removes the sin from over it and it doesn’t feel anymore, upon itself, the impulses towards sin.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We are together amongst us and with God through the faith, during our existence within the material bodies. We are together with our souls when we love one another in a sort of “reciprocal interiority” (Gabriel Madinier, Conscience et amour, Paris 1954). But the “reciprocal interiority” can take place even if we are separated from bodies. This is for the “reciprocal interiority” is reconciled with each person’s individual existence. We continue to be together with all the persons whom we have ever been together with, by communicating with our souls, even if we are physically separated. We see the beloved ones within us and nigh to us, to the extent we have been close to them with our soul. I go, through my thought, in a real manner, to the one whom I love, and He comes to us in his thought, even if neither I or him see this real closeness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 208-209)

²⁵⁵ B. VISESLAVTEV, The importance of the heart in religion, in Puti, Paris, 1025, p. 79, translation by D. Stăniloae in Theological Magazine, Sibiu, 1934, No. 1-2 and 3-4; V. Zencovski, The evil in man, Puti, 1938, May-June.

“All the man’s and history’s dramas, are because the man doesn’t take heed to their quality of unities of all components and form the fact that, in this unity, the elements cannot be maintained except by continuously strengthening their unity, in their quality as components of the synthesis of their being. The unity in man and the brotherly union amongst people, it cannot be maintained or strengthened except by continuously elevating their quality as components of the whole human, tied to God, towards God.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 56)

“The unity of the wholes-persons, and of them with the universe, in one and the same whole, it cannot come from itself. This unity is created and upheld by a superior Subject Who doesn’t only spiritually speak to the persons, but He also has created the persons and He upholds the persons in unity amongst themselves and in the universe’s unity, through His work as supreme creator and upholder Word, and that is reflected in the transformative power – but not also creator – of the peoples’ words. In the supreme Word-Person it has, as in a spring, its origin, the whole rational universe, and all the unconfounded rational wholes, which are parts of the universe’s unit.” (Stăniloae 1995: 48-49)

Virtue

“The work, led by thinking, is a main virtue which creates the communion amongst people. Thus, the human subjects become transparent to one another through nature, through their thinking and work applied in solidarity, as mutual help, to the nature. And for the communion amongst people is maintained by the responsibility towards the supreme Subject, he becomes, at His turn, transparent through the nature He has given, for the people to increase in communion through their work.” (Stăniloae 2003: 340)

“By bringing within Church the sacrifice of the virtues, or of our openness towards the infinite God – the Church as “the place” of our openness towards the infinity of God into Christ and towards the unity of the other believers in God – we accomplish by this, concretely, the unity of extended body of Christ, within which moves the endless love of the Persons of the Holy Trinity, unity to which the Word has laid down a beginning, through embodiment. The virtues are the forms and the degrees of our endless openness towards the Father and towards our fellow humans, through love, into Christ, for into Christ it has been made and eternally remains this openness. We open, on ourselves, to the Father, at the beginning through faith, and then through obedience, through restraint, through patience, through humbleness, all the virtues being degrees of surpassing out limits; the virtues are carries by love and they reach the culminant love, which has no end. But, through all of these we open, on ourselves, also to the infinite of our fellow humans, and we increase in the unity with them, in the infinity of the godlike love, which is put at our disposal into Christ, the Son of God Who has made, on Himself, available to us, as man.” (Stăniloae 2006: 94)

“Each man must cultivate all the virtues, because the total absence of one of the virtues (as for instance: the humbleness, the patience, the gentleness) it alters all the other virtues; but, for the possibility of progressing in good is endless, no man won’t ever reach the end of the virtues. Each man must strive to advance ever higher. All the virtues are related to a degree of love, which comes, on one hand, from the Ghost of love Who dwells within the man’s heart, and on the other hand they are an answer the man gives to it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 149)

“Practically, the virtues separate the meanings of the things from their passionate meanings, which darken the things; the virtues behave as such related to the things. That’s why the virtues areas well a seeing of God as transparent through persons and through things. The virtues do this by no longer seeing the things reduced to their simple material opaque thickness, for they have separated the mind form the passions aroused or produced by this thickness that doesn’t stirs up but the body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 150)

“To the clean one all the things are clean. To the clean one all the things are transparent to God as he is as well transparent to God. The clean one sees God through all the things. "Blessed are those who are pure in their heart, for they will see God". Thus, through the cleaning of passions and by achieving the virtues, the man is elevated to the knowledge of the rationalities of God, by contemplating the things in God and, by this he is elevated to the knowledge of God Himself. Knowing God it doesn't have a purely theoretical basis, but it has a practical one. Knowing God requires an effort to cleaning of passions and it required the achieving of the cleaning through virtues, it requires the clean love for all the things, in order the man to see God in all the things. Within the clean man, the whole cosmos regains its shininess in God, a shininess that is being spread through the man, from God." (Stăniloae 2006: 150)

"The bridge between our earthly life and the heavenly life it is our strengthening through virtues, which are openness towards God and towards fellow humans, helped by the godlike grace. The ladder from earth to heavens it is the progress in good, if the consummate good is God, the consummate existence. The firmness we have gained in virtues, it leads us to the firmness of the heavenly life, or to the firmness in the committed good. For it in it is shown the solidity of the existence and the harmony of the existent things, in the universal existence. The good, with his endless possibility of developing, it unveils in the same time the infinite depth and the always greater beauty of the existence, unlike the spasmodic repetition of the evil. For the aiming to good it is inscribed in the nature itself created by the good God, the heavens are potentially given within heart, though it need the help from God in order to consciously be actualized, being actually communion. The virtues as forms of the good aren't but the human forms of the God's features." (Stăniloae 1997: 199)

"The presence of Christ as an unseen force it is indicated by Holy Fathers as Mark the Ascetic and Maximos the Confessor, when saying that Christ is the virtues' being. If the virtue means manhood, and strength, and the being of this strength is Christ, it is obvious that in our ascesis it works the Christ's force." (Stăniloae 1992: 11)

"The activity which we help to forming our fellow human and ourselves through, it is crystallized in virtues which culminate in love. And these are actually the necessary stage which our being must cross through, before reaching the illumination and the mysterious union with God. But one cannot do a total separation between virtues and the activity oriented upon nature. We must prove to our fellow human our love also through our work done for him, and not only through words. You cannot give him a present, or alms, you cannot help him, without a productive activity upon nature. And on ourselves too, we couldn't completely form and we couldn't harmonically form if we do not participate at least once to a physical activity directed upon nature; and by this we achieve certain virtues of patience, of discipline, and of abnegation.” (Stăniloae 1992: 27)

“Amongst the three levels of the spiritual life, the first one is the level of the beginner, who must strive to accustom himself to virtues. There are seven virtues. At their beginning there is the faith; at their end there is the love, which is preceded by dispassion. The love concentrates in itself all the virtues and it passes the man from knowledge to contemplation. The target of the virtues or of the endeavors from the first stage is the liberation of passions or the dispassion. The virtues combat the passions and thus they indirectly serve the spirit constituting a level towards the ultimate goal, which is the knowledge.” (Stăniloae 1992: 52)

“If the restraint and the watching upon thoughts, usually done in moments of loneliness, it aims especially the passions of the lust (the covetousness of the belly, the fornication, and the love for money), the patience towards the discontents caused us by people and suffering the diverse troubles coming upon us, they are meant, especially to weaken the anger’s passions (the sadness and the upset), though they too contribute to an even fuller withering of the lust’s passions. That’s why this virtue has its place after the virtue of the restraint.” (Stăniloae 1992: 134)

Vision

“Palamas rejects the blasphemy which indirectly come out of the Barlaam writings, that all the prophets and all the saints had demonic and phantastic visions, because of any such vision is inferior to the cogitation.”
(Stăniloae 1993, 2: 77)

Weakness

“The nature’s weakness is shown – according to the Holy Fathers – in the nature’s lack of firmness, namely in the nature’s fickleness. And this fickleness is proven by the easiness which the mind is attracted by pleasure with and it is pushed away from pain. The nature hasn’t the strength to stay upright when facing these ones, but it reaches instead to a very unmanly vibratality, as a reed blown by wind. The nature’s will and righteous judgment, two of the essential nature’s elements, they totally lose their power. The nature reaches to be like a ball in the passions’ hands, tossed here and there by every circumstance, by all impressions. The nature no longer stands strongly in its freedom, but it has reached to a spiritual weakness which bears all the signs of the corruption; the nature proves by no means an incorruptibility ensuring it the eternity.” (Stăniloae 1992: 10)

Will

“Saint Maximos the Confessor showed how the human nature’s weakening by sin it has brought with it the affects which almost always are activated in association with the sin. It seems that in some extent, these affects existed also in the man’s primordial state, but they, instead of being overcome by the intensification of the work of the Lord in the human nature, they have grown up through the weakening of the Ghost’s work and by the weakening of the human nature. On the other hand, the human nature’s will, which is being activate by the own hypostasis to the average man, it takes in this man the form of some decisions chosen by the free will. And in this free will it is given the possibility of the sinful activation of the affects, or of not-resisting against their impulse to be activated in the sinful form. Saint Maximos the Confessor reckoned that in Christ there was no free human will, for there wasn’t a human subject who to decide differently than God did, but there was only the natural will of the human nature that was passing into concrete decisions through the Hypostasis of the embodied Word, and the human will had not a free will that could have chosen the sin. And the Hypostasis of the Word was activating always the according to the nature will, which was also conform to His divine will.” (Stăniloae 2006: 41)

“Without enduring the affects, one cannot overcome them. This is for, only by enduring them without allowing them to bring forth the sin as their fruit, they have lost their power. In a body that wouldn’t have needs, or that wouldn’t have any sensitivity to pain, the will wouldn’t strain itself in order to endure them without committing sin, and such a body wouldn’t empty itself, by will, of their power. Who doesn’t need to eat, he won’t have the occasion to overcome the pleasure and the covetousness which occur with the hunger; the one who doesn’t have the sensitiveness for pain, for the fear of death, he doesn’t have the occasion of overcoming them by straining his will. By the fact that in Christ the will has been hypostatized in God-the Word, Christ has had out of Himself the power of keeping undeveloped into pleasure of the satisfying of His bodily needs, and the pain caused by beatings, or the fear awakened by the perspective of the death, he has been able to keep them under His control, in order not to end in acts of cowardice, of betraying the will of God and the values He wanted, because of these affects.” (Stăniloae 2006: 42)

“The secret of the lack of sins and of the impossibility to commit sins, in stood in Christ in the power His human will was receiving from the Hypostasis of the Word Who was its subject; it stood also in the fact that He has been born without bearing the ancestral sin. Also, it stood in the fact that His will wasn’t configured in the free will of a human autonomous person, being alone under the pressure of the human nature’s impulses and having at its disposal only the powers weakened by sin. But the fact that it could have wanted more firmly, it didn’t spare it from the need of truly wanting, of truly applying the power of wanting more firmly. On the other hand, Christ, by kenosis, he didn't give His human nature so much power so to make the effort of His human nature's will as inutile. This was for He wanted that any man to be able to keep, as he did, his affects within the limits of the strict needs of the nature. He has given, consequently, His human will too, often, only that much power that followed to be necessary also to the other people in order to keep this affects within the limits of the nature's needs. In the other people has been created the habit to slip away from the occasion of satisfying the natures' needs, beyond the strict satisfying of these needs, namely to slip into sin. These habits didn't exist in Christ. The ones who have Christ within them, they have Him with His lack of sins, and they are able to overcome, with His help the sinful habits. But they can also do it, if they will use their own will - as Christ did it. For they are communicated the same will of Christ an-hypostatized in God-the Word. And by keeping their affects in the same strict satisfying within the borders of the natural needs, they empty these affects of powers, and they prepare to themselves the resurrection to a life which to lack the sufferings and the corruptibility, as Christ had it." (Stăniloae 2006: 42)

"If the people do not always succeed in avoiding the sin, in the union with the Resurrected and All-Clean Christ, they will still be partakers to resurrection, with Him, to the free of suffering and free of corruptibility life. The ones who believe in Christ, they can overcome - at their turn - the sliding towards the sin in satisfying the human nature's will, for the root of the sin within their nature is abolished within them by the presence within them of the body of Christ, which is without sin. In fact, the same will of Christ is, within them too, united with their will, in order to overcome the habits which remained in their human nature." (Stăniloae 2006: 42)

"We mustn't understand our will as a force staying within us as detached from the ensemble of all the tendencies composing the dynamism of our being; but our will, as general tension of our being to exist, it must be will, all our aspirations, it must want all of them, it must be in all of them. Of course, that our will must want each of them, and in each of them our will must be as a force of accomplishing, for each of our tendencies it is framed in the general purpose of our whole being, for it collaborates to the wellbeing of the whole." (Stăniloae 1992: 79)

"The fact that the will, as function of the entire being, it is with each of the tendencies of this being, it gives to all tendencies a justification in front of it. All tendencies are legitimated, all of them have rationality for the will, and all of them are imparted in some measure with the will of existing of our being, as ensemble. The rationality and the will from within our tendencies, they stay in their justification and in their power of existing, which they are conferred with by their appurtenance to the ensemble of our being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 79)

“The will and the rationality from within our tendencies, either they deceive the general will and rationality of our being, in order to join them, or they cause these general will and rationality to weaken in their function as sheltering and promoting the interests of our being’s whole, facing the force which some singular tendency bursts off with, and the sinful tendencies remain the only one keeping their ground and they take the role of guiding rationality and will, and they act, by substituting themselves for the general will and rationality, or by working as they would be the general will and rationality.” (Stăniloae 1992: 79-80)

“We still feel within us the presence of the general will and rationality – even if they have been replaced with the sinful tendencies – which disapprove everything is being done. That’s why, most often, we feel within us two will and two rationalities. Only to the ones who have totally fell under the power of a passion the whole rationality can be totally perverted, in order to justify without reserves the justification of the tendency from within that passion in order to dominate upon the whole nature. And only in those one the whole will is put in the service of the passions. To the most of the people, making abstraction of the moments of the passion’s fury, of the moment of total “blindness”, there still remain a reserve of rationality and of will pleading - of course, without an effective force – for the rights of the being as a whole, and which ascertain that the rationality and the will which have been put in the service of the passion they do a wrong thing, that that will is “an irrational will”, a will that doesn’t fully bear the characteristics of the freedom, as the rationality serving the passion is a “reckless rationality” too. In such a case there has taken place a rupture in two of the will and of the rationality, or it has taken place a ramifying of their function, in a perverse action and in a healthy action. We work in this case, “willingly against our will”. (Blondel, quoted work: 195)” (Stăniloae 1992: 80)

“The affect has become sin only through the partial or total solidarity between the rationality and the will and the sin. But the role of the rationality and of the will it doesn’t stop here. But, after the respective partial tendency has been satisfied by attracting the rationality and the will on its side, these ones strive to justify the adhesion which they have manifested, maybe, somewhat unwillingly”. (Stăniloae 1992: 80-81)

Woman

“This knowledge about the simple meanings of the creatures – simple, yet endlessly deep – it is the fruit of a love that is superior to loving them due to a perishable material interest. Even the love for woman, which overcomes the sensuality, it is a superior love, for it is durable, loving and respecting the woman in her eternal mystery and in her undiminished spiritual dimensions, known through this clean love in God. In this sense, to the ones who are advanced into Christ, there is no longer man (to the woman) or woman (to the man), but they all are one into Christ (Gal. 3: 28), for the man and the woman meet in their spirit which is identical in his depth and cleanness.” (Stăniloae 2006: 151)

“The conditions the receivers of the Ordination are requested, they have a spiritual signification. The members of the hierarchy cannot be but men, for they are called to be the seen organs of Christ, the unique unseen committer of the Mystery; and Christ was a man. The women give birth and can raise their children for priesthood, like the Lord’s Mother did. The women are the mothers of the priests and of the bishops, God exercising through them the greatest spiritual authority upon priests and bishops.” (Stăniloae 1997: 114)

“The woman has in her quietude a surety and a capacity of giving trust to the man, who, beyond the power demonstration need to be sustained by a mother. John, the apostle, he was entrusted by Jesus to His Holy Mother, as to his Mother. “Woman, behold your son”. The bishops have, at their turn, their mothers, who advise them with their wisdom and with their strength of faith. (...) The man who doesn’t have a woman, he gets lost in abstractions; his woman keeps him connected to life, a life having its basis in the godlike life, in the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 114)

Wonders

“The wonders seem to totally overcome the nature’s laws. But on the other hand, in most of the cases they do not do but to show the nature an opening towards the nature’s most characteristic target, to which the repetition’s laws do not allow the nature to reach at, because of the spirit’s weakening. This is said by Saint Maximos the Confessor when he expresses the idea that the wonders represent a renewal of the mode the rationality of the human nature it being fulfilled in or the rationality of the nature’s by and large, and the wonders aren’t an alteration of it. This is for between the created nature and the powers of God Who consummates the creature He has created, there is no contradiction, as there is no contradiction between nature and what is superior to the nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 388-390)

“When the wonders totally overwhelm this established order, this phenomenon doesn’t take place on a general plan, but only to the respective object or subject. The world as a whole it allows such moments in the immense ocean of its reality. The wonders do not destroy the general fabric of the world’s order, like the pores do not destroy the body’s skin, and neither the more transparent points of a fabric destroy the continuity of that fabric. These points attest the presence of a fundamental order which maintains the world’s order and towards which the world is summoned. And in its resurrected state, the whole fabric of the nature will become transparent. This transparency will be in the same time of a great elasticity, because of the rigidity from now is maintained by the fact that all the things are towards death. The absence of death it will mean elasticity and freedom, or maximum contingency, though the images from now will be maintained in their identity; they will maintain their identity through the profound variety of their spiritual rationalities. The varied communicability amongst them, it won’t cause any prejudice to their freedom, but it will accentuate their freedom.” (2003: 391)

“In wonders, the human spirit strengthened by the divine spirit or the divine spirit Himself crosses more visible with his power through the nature. And on the measure the spirit would be strengthened within people, the spirit would increasingly more cross through the whole environment of the nature, and in the first place, through the people’s bodies.” (2003: 391)

“The mastery upon the human nature assumed in the act of bringing it to existence, through and in His Hypostasis, as also the mastery upon the human nature’s irreproachable affects, it didn’t mean enslaving the human nature, but it meant elevating the human nature to the condition as nature of free His hypostasis, by infusing the freedom to the human soul too. This is for He has taken our nature “without passiveness”, as Saint Maximos the Confessor said (G.P. 91, 532). By this, Christ has brought a fulfilling to our aspiration for controlling our affects and for a freedom from them and even from the nature’s laws, a state we will be found worthy of too, if we attach ourselves to Him and if we communicate with Him, and we can either shape, and sometimes even defeat these laws through wonders, a victory which we will fully share at our resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1995: 146)

Word

“In the Orthodox vision, the Revelation’s word also indicates a communication of mysterious nature between God and man.” (Stăniloae 1992: 19)

“Somehow, God stretches through His power, to where a prophetic organ utters His Revelation’s word. But in order the listener to receive the certitude of the godlike character of this word, the godlike power steps even further, namely to the listener’s soul, as an irradiation out of the word itself, which is different to the listener from any other human word, and as a power making the listener able to notice what others, who haven’t received this power, or who don’t want to receive this power, they cannot notice it. Anyway, the power of the same godhead that speaks through its Revelation’s organ it reaches also the listeners’ souls.” (Stăniloae 1992: 21)

“If the revealed word of God, taken in itself, it cannot be only a pure meaning, but it is also a bearer of the dynamic interest of God in the man, it must bring within us a prolongation of godlike power. The faith’s phenomenon, awakened within us by this word, namely the fact that we are created in order to be able to receive this word, it is at its turn a sign of an unmediated bond which it has established with us. In the faith’s phenomenon the attention of God encounters the attention awakened by Him within us. But the encounter between two persons through their reciprocal attention it is an encounter through something that is characteristic to each of them: even the fact that somebody’s word compels me to answer him it implies my bond with him. But in this unconditional necessity of addressing myself to somebody and of answering him, it is shown the fact that, through all the words and answers, I am in connection with God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 21)

“The word can also be used in order to darken the major meaning of the person, by being the word used for dividing the fellow humans, in order to be impeded the exercising of the responsibility for one another, and thus the word can be used in order the human being to advance towards an eternal unhappiness. The word loses its purpose when uttered with pride towards other people. Such people make of their word a “resounding cymbal”, a pompous sound without a content. In such form the word is no longer a conventus (Latin: assembly), a place for real communication, namely towards the real reciprocal strengthening in the true life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 99)

“Each human being searches for his fellow human, through the material universe, for he feels himself as driven by an impulse from himself, an impulse which he hasn’t given it to himself, not to his fellow human. Thus, the human being transcends the material universe, for God, for God has given the universe in order the human being to cross through universe towards Him, namely in order the human being to do God's will. Sometimes it is communicated more, through some useful things, through some helping deeds, namely through deeds representing a sacrifice of the human beings, or, some other times, by using sign of symbols (for instance, a flower). These are, in themselves, thing of a minor importance, or words, as expressions of the things. Therefore, the French poet Pierre Emmanuel could say: "Dire c'est aimer". The words are too, limited in their meanings. They only can suggest the unlimited. The words, by and large, they are finite means which is expressed through, the indefinite, or even the infinite. That's why, also through the words limited in meaning, which the people communicate to one another, they experience a transcending towards infinite, or towards the infinite God, showing by that that they feel Him as actively present in their spirit, either when they utter the words or when they joyfully hear the words. Even in the increasingly greater multitude of words, socially determined, used by the today's human being, he feels himself, on one hand, as expressing a limited meaning of him, but, in the same time, the occasion of using these words makes him to live "his indefinite, even in the details of his daily life... this dialectic... constitute the dialogue between finite and infinite. I sometimes rejoice of the fact of being indefinable, that is the best gift given me by the One Who is, namely the gift of being open to what is inexhaustible; but I also rejoice of the limit, of what is average, of the common place in its inexhaustible poverty" (Pierre Emmanuel. 1950. Le Personnalisme, P.U.F. Paris, 161). This is for I see, also in what is limited, beyond its limit, the infinity. Or in the word having a limited meaning, expressed in sound, and conveyed by the air waves, I introduce the indefinite from above that meaning. This can be done, by the human being, with any part of the universe, no matter how small, when he gives that as a gift. This is for in the limited thing and word, the human being places a feeling of unlimited love, of his." (Stăniloae 1995: 123-124)

"Properly-said, the words as expressed rationalities, they reflect the rationalities which the together people discover within things, out of the correspondence of their rationality with the things. Each human being, but also together with others, he has in his mind the whole universe in the meanings noticed in collaboration. Each human being it has the universe as explained in these meanings, together with others, in order they to be able to communicate the universe through common words. Each human being is a spiritual bearer of the cosmos and he communicates the cosmos out of his own perspective, in order the human beings to be enriched together; thus, the universe proves that it hides in itself as many modes of being understood as many human being exist, but all those diverse modes must be united in each one's understanding, in order all the human beings to become richer spiritually, and united on an increasingly higher level, in discovering the increasingly deeper meanings of the universe and of their understanding." (Stăniloae 1995: 126)

“The words’ transfiguration isn’t only a filling up of theirs, with a higher meaning, but it is also their filling up with a power that elevates us, and which we transcend through. God Himself elevates us, through this power, above ourselves, from the created universe that is submitted to the laws. The words, by and large, are transfigured when are addressed to a respected or to a loved person. All the more is that when the words are addressed to God. The words catch up, like a lightning rod, the God’s power from above. The loving relation amongst persons it transfigures the words, it fills the words up with a power and with a meaning that are above the natural ones. The persons give the words always new meanings and powers. When I meet you in a communication of a request and of a gift, I cannot draw a border between what I give and what you give, as power and as understanding, namely between what I given even by asking for and what you receive even by fulfilling my request. Likewise, it is not possible to draw a border between the work of the one who prays and the work of God in that one’s prayer. Even the warmth of the request that impresses God it still is from God. God have made me as partner to the common work with Himself. But what I give it actually comes from God. When I feel myself weak in front of Him, I am made by God as His partner. “When I am weak then I am strong” (II Cor. 12: 10). All the things are here under the power of God, a power that has become mine, for it is a power of our united love, or a power of His love that has given birth to my love.” (Stăniloae 1995: 162)

Work

“The work bears the sign of the love amongst the people; and through its tiresome, ascetic character, it spiritualized the people and the fruits the nature gives to the people, or the sensitive nature which, if used without work, it would become the sum of means of a live of pleasures, lacking the force of the man’s spiritualization, and without the influence of the freedom upon it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 340)

“The man’s power of processing the nature through the thought deed, through work, by meeting the nature as a gift, it is at its turn nourished out of the incomparable power of the deed of The One Who has created the gift of the nature, or the One Who didn’t process at His turn a given nature, but Who has created the nature out of nothing. The work with limited effects, done by the man upon nature, in order to make it at his turn a gift to others, it hints thus towards the creative deed, Whose complete gift is the nature. Out of the creative power of God Who has created the world out of nothing, it takes its origin the limited creative power of the man upon nature. The limited creation of the man it is founded on the God’s creative act out of nothing.” (Stăniloae 2003: 340-341)

“The road towards the Christian consummation it doesn’t exclude any kind of work, but it requires that through each work to pursuit the achieving of the virtues. Nobody must imagine that the work he does it is a purpose in itself, but that work is meant to beautify his nature with the virtues of the patience, of the restraint, of the love for his fellow humans, of the faith in God, and, gradually, to open his eyes regarding the wise rules placed by God in all things. By this, the worker doesn’t let himself to be carried away by a random flowing of his life in time, but he strives to guide his life’s development towards its true targets. The ultimate goal of the work and of the participation to the world’s life it is not so much the unfolding of the nature, but it rather is the normal development of the latencies from within man and from within his fellow humans. Even in enduring the troubles, which is one of the most important means of the Christian asceticism, we do not have a running away from the world’s life, but we have a persevering within world. And the care for the fellow humans’ forming, by adorning them with virtues, it doesn’t mean non-participation to the world’s life, but it means the fullest collaboration, if the man is part of the mankind, and his forming is the ultimate target of the creation.” (Stăniloae 1992: 28)

Word /

Universe /

Cosmos

“On the other hand, the cosmos itself had been meaningless, despite its rationality, if there would have been given the human rationality which to know the cosmos on the basis of cosmos’s rationality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 10)

“(…) the world has a rationality in order to be known by us – rational beings. That’s why it must have its origin in a Being Who aimed, by creating the world – and He continues aiming, by preserving the world – to be the world known and, by being the world known by the man, he aims also to be known Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 11)

“(…) the world is necessary (...) The world, existing as unconscious object, it exists for the man.” (Stăniloae 2003: 11)

“The fact that world is lightened within man and for man and through man, it shows that the world is for the man, and not the man for the world (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 12)

“The world is created in order to be humanized, and not the man to be assimilated to the world, to the nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 12)

“The whole world is created in order to become a big man, or the man’s content which has become all-comprising within each person (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 12)

“(…) through the world’s assimilation within man, the nature itself wins, by being elevated on a totally new plan, without being, properly said, lost. Our lost within nature it doesn’t represent any progress for the nature, whilst the continuous or eternal humanization of the nature it represents an eternal progress (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 12)

“(…) the world is called to be humanized whole, namely the whole world to receive the seal of the human, to become pan-human, being actualized within the world a need implied by its purpose; to become whole a humanized cosmos (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 13)

“(…) the whole cosmos, practically, it serves to the human existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 13)

“The different structures are strictly preserved, though they become internal to one another; or, they are preserved just because they are reciprocally internal. This fact is characteristic also to the world in the unity and in the variety of its components, or in its eternal and consummate report with God. This is the deepest signification of the transcendence of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 97)

“The fact that in the apophatic knowledge the soul is absorbed by the noticing of the presence of God, it determined the Oriental Fathers to speak sometimes about a forgetting of the world during this act. But this doesn’t actually mean a withdrawal from the world. Even being in the world, somebody can contemplate God as being the One Who is totally different from the world, either be God transparent to him through the world or apart from the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 117)

“(…) getting above the world’s things it doesn’t mean the disappearance of the world’s things, but elevating somebody through them beyond them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 117)

“(…) without the existence of the human persons, the world as creation it would seem purposeless, or as a simple showing up of unilateral – and therefore limited – power of God, for Himself. And a God Who would need such a demonstration of power, he would bear within Himself a weakness. The nature’s world is created for the human subject, namely not for the human subject to have the possibility of manifesting through the world a creator power, like God does, but in order the world to be a means of communication between the human person and the divine Person, in order the world to be framed through the human person in the plan of the divine-human personal relation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 120)

“(…) this limited content of the created realities it cannot exist without the power and outside the Trinitarian infinity. By existing from the beginning through participation to that infinity, the Creation is called to reach an increasing participation to the Trinitarian infinity. From here it is explained the possibility of the ambiguity that the Creation can be regarded not only as finite, but also as infinite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 168)

“Each world’s element and each divine light referring that element, it has at its basis a thought and a unitary work of God, and therefore the world’s composition has, in the same time, a unity at its basis, the world being maintained in its mysterious unity by a unitary work, and in the same time a diverse work, He Who is One in His essence, as unitary origin of all His thoughts and works.” (Stăniloae 2003: 172)

“The ontological unity of the world in God, it is firstly shown in the fact that all the unities existing in its frame are in relation with one another, and with the Creator and the All-Keeper, Who, on the other hand, He is above any relation which would determine or differentiate Him. Then the ontological unity of the world in God is shown by the fact that all the differentiated things are united too, through the realities existing amongst them and, in the last analysis, they are united through the efficient general rationality of the created world. This is for the general rationality of the world it is not divided in the genres from it. And the rationality of no genre is divided in its subspecies, and the rationality of no species is divided with the individuals of the species. Therefore, there exist a general rationality of the world, with the whole its variety of genres, a unity of each genre with the whole subordinated species, and there exists also a unity of each species with the whole variety of individuals belonging to it; but there is also a unity of the individual, with the whole variety of component elements and of accidents. And the most accentuated and the most mysterious unity, it is that of the human subject, through his fundamentally spiritual character.” (Stăniloae 2003: 173-174)

“Only because God is through Himself the plenitude above any determining and becoming, and above any growing up or decreasing, God was able to create a world destined to be imparted with His eternity, an eternity understood as plenitude of the interpersonal communion. This is because the creation of the world wouldn’t have any other purpose. And a world that exists through itself as an impersonal reality, which grows up and decreases in a closed circle, it wouldn’t have any reason and it would be totally inexplicable.” (Stăniloae 2003: 182)

“God has created the world in order to make it partaker to eternity or to the communion with Him, not by the world’s being but by grace, by imparting the world with the eternity. This is because the eternity, by being transcendent to the temporal creature, it cannot come as temporal additions but only as a gift from another plan.” (Stăniloae 2003: 183)

“The dynamic factor of increasing the unification of the world and of unifying the world with god, or of exceeding the space: it is the man. The man is from the beginning the connection ring between the world’s parts and the space’s parts. But the man is called to gather all these parts within him, in a maximum manner. That’s why Saint Maximos the Confessor prefers to call the man not as “microcosm” but as the true “macrocosm”. According to our faith, the man is the world’s ring by the fact that it is connected through his parts, but especially through his rationality, to all the world’s parts. This is because the entire world is a system of concretized rationalities, a system that the human rationality gradually gathers it in itself, in collaboration amongst its subjects.” (Stăniloae 2003: 215)

“The plan of God regarding the world it represents also a kenosis of His. This plan is a descending of God to the dimensions, to the possibilities, and to the necessities of the world. Through wisdom, God creates and upholds a harmony amongst the world’s components, through which he preserves all these components unmerged and not-separated. Even though this is a reflex of the intrinsic discernment of God. But by pursuing the maximum and definitive good of all the world’s components, and of the world as a whole,

He cannot see this good, as maximum but unmerged union of theirs, except in their maximum dwelling in Himself. That's why the wisdom of God isn't only a descent of His to the world, to all the things, and to all the people from within world, but it is also an ensemble of adequate actions for the continuous elevating to the common and harmonious impartation with the godlike life and happiness. The culminant wisdom of God regarding the world is concretized in "the eternal counsel or plan" regarding the world's salvation, regarding the world's consummation through Himself, and regarding the fulfillment of this plan." (Stăniloae 2003: 253-254)

"The wisdom of God unveiled in revelation and in a culminant manner into the resurrected Christ – opening to us too, the perspective of the resurrection – it doesn't contradict, therefore, the essence of the world's order, but it restores it, and it completes it, and it elevates it on a higher plan. But for it corrects the state we are fallen in, it often appears as contrary to the essence of the world's order." (Stăniloae 2003: 254)

"To a judgment that only sees the rigid origin of the nature, the wisdom manifested in nature it seems to be superior to the wisdom unveiled in the Revelation that culminates into Christ; or, it seems to be the only true wisdom. But, according to our conception, it is more profound, in reality, a wisdom that reveals the world's order as basis for the development of the human being towards an eternal existence. This is because only this answers the value and the desire of the human being; it is more profound a wisdom that reveals the world's order as basis for a superior and eternal dialogue with god and with the fellow humans; it is therefore more profound a wisdom that reestablishes the human being in the superior and complex order of the normal interpersonal relations, upheld by the dialogue of endless exigency, finesse, and complexity, with God, a dialogue that can shape in a superior sense the nature's order too." (Stăniloae 2003: 254)

"The dependency of the human on the nature, which doesn't mean his descent to the nature but vice versa, it is so deep than one can say that the nature is a part of the man's nature, it is the source of a part of the human nature, and therefore it is a condition of the integral existence and development of the man on earth. The man cannot be conceived outside the cosmic nature. This can mean that neither the nature fulfills its purpose without the man, or through a man who works contrary to the nature. Thus, the nature isn't only the condition of the existence of the singular man, but it is also the condition of the human solidarity. The nature appears totally clear like the environment through which the man can do good or bad to his fellow humans, developing or ruining himself from ethical and spiritual point of view. The nature is intercalated with full evidence in the inter-human benefactor or destructive dialogue, a dialogue without which neither the singular man nor the human community can exist.” (Stăniloae 2003: 337-338)

“The impossibility of separating the human person from the cosmic nature it makes the salvation and the consummation of the person to be projected upon the whole nature and to depend on nature too; also, it determines that the singular person, through his own diligence, to be able to help also others, or to be helped by them. The entire nature is destined to the glory the people will be imparted with in the Kingdom of Heavens, and even by now is influenced by the serenity and the light which irradiates out of the holy man. The glory of Christ, on Mount Tabor, it covered the nature too. But it can remain hidden from the eyes and from the feeling of many, and the nature can be disregarded and affected by the evilness of some of the people. At its turn, the nature can become the environment through which h the man who believes can receive the godlike grace or the benefactor uncreated energies, but also the place where influences are exercised upon the man pushing him towards evil.” (Stăniloae 2003: 338-339)

“The impossibility of separating the human person from the cosmic nature it makes the salvation and the consummation of the person to be projected upon the whole nature and to depend on nature too; also, it determines that the singular person, through his own diligence, to be able to help also others, or to be helped by them. The entire nature is destined to the glory the people will be imparted with in the Kingdom of Heavens, and even by now is influenced by the serenity and the light which irradiates out of the holy man. The glory of Christ, on Mount Tabor, it covered the nature too. But it can remain hidden from the eyes and from the feeling of many, and the nature can be disregarded and affected by the evilness of some of the people. At its turn, the nature can become the environment through which h the man who believes can receive the godlike grace or the benefactor uncreated energies, but also the place where influences are exercised upon the man pushing him towards evil.” (Stăniloae 2003: 338-339)

“The nature proved to be a means through which the man grows up spiritually and he fructifies his intentions towards himself and towards his fellow humans, when the nature is maintained and used in conformity with itself; but when the man sterilizes the nature, when he poisons the nature, and when he abuses the nature in huge proportions, he actually impedes his others’ spiritual growth. This confirms the fact that the nature is given as necessary means for the development of the humanity in solidarity, that the nature is a gift of a superior Person, Who has created the nature and the people, in solidarity. This solidarity hasn’t been produced by man, but he can develop or weaken it, towards the good or towards the bad of his and of his fellow humans. Its origin transcends the man’s powers, likewise the origin of his being. But getting adequate to the gift of the nature that transcends, in its origin, the man's powers, it becomes obvious their common origin in the exclusive act of God, in their creation by God, out of nothing. If in their essence they had pointed towards themselves, our responsibility towards God, regarding our behavior towards nature and towards our fellow humans, it wouldn't have been so total." (Stăniloae 2003: 339-340)

"Understanding the nature as gift from God, it doesn't mean that the nature mustn't be processed. The nature is made thus than many of the things necessary to the man are obtained through a processing of the nature by him, and in this processing an important place is held by the continuously creative imagination. Only the animal is totally framed in what the nature gives invariably to it. The man proves to be by this the 'master' of the nature; and the nature is a malleable and contingent reality, adequate to the man's imagination. Here it is inscribed the great role of the thinking, of the imagination, and of the human work, through which are accomplished the man's creative thinking in nature. By his work, every man obtains the necessary means not only for himself but also for his fellow humans. The people must work and think in solidarity in order to process the gifts from the nature. Thus, it is accomplished a solidarity amongst people through the mediation of the nature." (Stăniloae 2003: 340)

"On the other hand, in the human conscience and in the love for the fellow humans which is manifested in any work upon nature, there is a thirst of knowledge and of unlimited processing of the nature. The nature itself proves to be made for conscience, and not the conscience is made for nature. The nature proves to be a rationality brought to reality, which can be, in principle, endlessly shaped by conscience, and it can be completely transferred in the contents of the inter-human loving conscience." (Stăniloae 2003: 341)

"Both the conscience and the nature hint towards the existence of an eternal conscience, which comprises from eternity not only the whole rational fabric and possible to materialize in countless forms, of the nature, but also the power of actually materializing it and, through this, the power of creating it out of nothing and to shape it to its totally overwhelming by the spirit. By this it satisfies the thirst of the human conscience for this full overwhelming of the nature by the human spirit in communion, or of its gathering into spirit, state towards which the matter itself proves to be destined, as objective materialized rationality. This work is accomplished by the Creator Spirit through the human spirit." (Stăniloae 2003: 341)

"The rational fabric of the world must have a subject who thinks at it, a subject who is truly knowledgeable and master of the created world and this subject can operate also through the created conscience, in communion, the gathering and the transforming of the matter into spirit. The Creator Spirit Who is the origin of the materialized rationality of the nature and of the conscious subjects related to it, it is their target, a target the human subjects find their full unity in, together with the nature their communicate through, a nature elevated to a fully overwhelmed by spirit state.” (Stăniloae 2003: 341-342)

“The creation of the world out of nothing, by God, it becomes obvious today in its limitations too, through which Himself limits us. But even through this limitation He helps us to grow spiritually, by putting a brake to our egotism, through the care of brotherly share the limited resources of the world, of giving also others the possibility to develop themselves. God makes us today to be more solidary amongst us, and through this to grow up spiritually through work and sacrifice. This is a new asceticism, a positive asceticism, generalized and mandatory, which isn’t through in a contradiction with its older forms but it can find in them a power of sustaining. Our responsibility towards the nature given us by God it appears today as a duty to spare the resources and not to alter the nature by polluting it. This protects us from passions and from searching for an infinite satisfying into world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 342)

“A world that had existed from ever, in evolving forms, identical in their essence to the present world it would be itself the absolute, namely the sole reality. But the absolute cannot wear the mask of the nonsense and of the limitations, the present form of the world has it in itself, considered as the sole reality, or they essentially identical things, in which all the things compose and decompose themselves. Even if there had been a superior, unknown meaning in this relativity, it should be somebody to be conscious about himself in an eternal manner, and in such a case he would have been the absolute truth, superior to this relativity. And if nobody had been conscious about such a meaning, such a meaning wouldn’t have existed. But our conscience, though, the highest form of existence in this world, it requests that this world to be saved from the relativity within it; this world must find its meaning on a plan of existence superior to the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 343)

“If the one who has created the world isn’t superior to it, he cannot save it either. The salvation of the world by God it presupposes its creation by God. If the world it has been created, it has had a beginning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 343)

“The world isn’t contrary to eternity, as Origen reckoned; neither the world is a linear eternity in itself. The world it has its origin in eternity, it is sustained by eternity, and it is destined to become eternal in a kind of eternity that isn't the same with the eternity of God. This is because the world isn't eternal by itself, but through God." (Stăniloae 2003: 349)

"The fact that the man feels together with the world as totally depending on the will of God it shows that the man and the world do not have their source in an eternal self-potency, and neither they are out of the being of God. The world is created by God out of nothing. The world's concretized rationalities, but they have as model and as sustainers the eternal rationalities of the Logos. If the world had been out of the being of God, it would have been, by its being, partaker to the plenitude of God, and the man, connected to the world, he would have been eternal and equal to God, and the man's responsibility towards God and the man's thirst towards an absolute that is superior to the world - they couldn't have been explained. The world neither is out of an eternal substance, a substance that would be coexistent to God. This is because of in this case too, the world would be equal in eternity to God, and both God and the world would limit reciprocally, not having either God or the world the plenitude. If that had been the case, God wouldn't have been better than the world and the world couldn't have been saved from its absurd relativity. If that had been the case, there wouldn't have been existed an unconditional human responsibility and a norm of this responsibility. God couldn't have imposed to the world the form He wanted for the world, neither God could have imposed to the man a direction towards Himself, through the exercise of a responsibility." (Stăniloae 2003: 350-351)

"According to the Christian faith, God has created the world for a motif and on a purpose. This fact gives the world a sense. The Holy Fathers highlighted the kindness of God as motif of the creation, in order to oppose it to the idea that God has created the world out of an internal need of His, an affirmation that leads to pantheism." (Stăniloae 2003: 352)

"According to the Christian faith, the world has been created by god as a gift for people. The life is a gift from God. Everything the man eats and drinks 'consequently to his work is a gift from God' (Eccl. 3: 13). The wisdom, the science, the joy, all of them are gifts from God (Eccl. 2: 26). Even if the world had been given to the man only towards knowledge, it still would have been a gift from God. But the world is given also for the man's bodily life, and for the man's spiritual forming for the eternal live. In this it is shown the love of God for the man. The world is also from this point of view: a word, or a coherent speech of God towards man, in a continuous advancing. The world proves also in this, its sense." (Stăniloae 2003: 354-355)

"God shows us His love through the world as gift, in order to accomplish in love a progressive dialogue with us. But for this we must also to turn to God a gift. But the man has nothing to give from himself to God. God rejoices when the man renounces to some of the gifts he has received from God, by giving those gifts back to him. This is the man's sacrifice, for he could consider in his greediness that all the received gifts are necessary to him, he though renounces to some of those gifts. By doing this the man recognizes that he has everything from God as gifts and everything belongs to God. The world shows in its character as gift from God, that it isn't the ultimate and the absolute reality. The world is necessary to the man not only for the man needs the world to be given to him, but also for he needs the world to give it back, at his turn, for his spiritual growing up. By this, the world proves its educative character for the man. The man uses the world also by the fact that he gives the world at his turn. And the man doesn't totally lose the world by the act of giving, but he adorns himself even more by the fact that he gives the world: "It is happier to give than to take". The man truly enriches himself not only through the gift from God towards him, but also through the complete dialogue of the gift, namely through receiving and through turning back the gift. The paradox is explained by the fact that the received and turned back gift brings the persons close in such a measure that the object of the gift it becomes common and it becomes the transparent means of the fullest communication between persons. And the gift becomes not only common but also increased through the life the persons communicated to each other through the love manifested in the gift they make; through this the persons give themselves, and through this giving they increase spiritually." (Stăniloae 2003: 355-356)

"The things given us by God, they can become our gift towards God, by the fact that we are free in turning the things back to God. We transform the things in gifts from us, through the act of our freedom, and through the love we show towards God. Towards this we can transform and combine the things endlessly. God has given the world to the man, not only as a gift of continuous fertility, but also of a great richness of alternatives possible to be actualized by man through freedom and work. This actualizing as multiplied talents, initially given us by God, it is the man's gift towards God." (Stăniloae 2003: 356)

"Essentially, through the gift of the world God wants to make Himself, and His love, known to the man. That's why the man too must elevate himself above the received gifts, towards God Himself Who has given him these gifts. The gift, as sign of the love a person has for another, it has imprinted in itself the destination of being surpassed by the one whom it has been given to. In a way, the gift is thing the person who has given it he renounces at, for the sake of the person whom he has given that thing." (Stăniloae 2003: 357)

"The world as nature, it proves to be a unitary rational reality, existing for the inter-human dialogue, as a condition for the man's spiritual growing up, for the development of the humanity. According to the Church's Fathers, all the things have their rationalities in the godlike Logos, or in the supreme rationality. If the world had been destined only for being food, it wouldn't have been necessary its rational character. It is true that the animals too are using the rationality of the physical-biological processes of the nature, though only for the biological and unconscious growing up. But if the animals hadn't had the purpose of serving the man, their growing up would have been even more meaningless." (Stăniloae 2003: 360)

"The rationality of the world has multiple potentialities. It is malleable, it is contingent, and the man is the one who uses and brings this character to light." (Stăniloae 2003: 360)

"Even the analytic knowledge of the things opens new perspectives in unveiling new meanings of the things. Thus, the world proves to be the inexhaustible 'light', according to the Romanian word 'lume', which comes from the Latin word 'lumen'." (Stăniloae 2003: 362)

"If between the human subject and his content composed of the rationalities of the things one cannot make a separation, or the subject himself develops through their content, the things as content of the subject will be necessary to the subject's development. At the core, the subject, by his thoughts about things and by words, he expresses himself. He is the 'truth'. When the words do not express him, they are liar words. And the things serve to the unfolding of the subject who remains without them a pure potency. Equally necessary though, for actualizing the subject, it is the relating to the other human subjects and to the absolute Person. Without this relating the man doesn't manifest any interest in unfolding his subject. Thus, the righteous truth the words express, namely the true subject expressed through words, it includes a positive relating of the man to his fellow humans' persons and to the absolute Person. But by accomplishing by words this relating the man actually accomplishes it through things. A righteous attitude towards the things it is a righteous attitude towards the fellow human and towards God, and vice versa. And on this it hangs our righteous development." (Stăniloae 2003: 371)

"The natural rationality of the things it is only the first step of the ladder we are ascending on, towards the increasingly higher meanings of theirs, that equals to ascending in knowing the thoughts of God regarding us, and in knowing and forming ourselves, forming that, at its turn, it elevates us to new meanings of ours, to an increasingly higher knowing of the things. If we had been able to detach the rationality of the things' repetition from their deeper meaning, the responsibility to know the things it would have been only the responsibility of knowing the bodily utility of the things. But because we cannot separate their rationality, which repeats itself, from their meanings, the responsibility of knowing them in their true meanings coming out of their rationality, it is also a responsibility of spiritually forming ourselves in connection with the things, according to the will of God, by not imprinting any passion or any narrowing in their meanings and, by doing so, not darkening the things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 373)

“To God the world isn’t only malleable, and flexible, but it is also totally contingent, in the sense that the world isn’t necessary to him. Only thus, the world is the work of His liberty and love. To man, once the world is given as condition of the man’s existence, the world’s contingency is limited, or the world is much more malleable, for the man, endowed by God with freedom, he can use the world in some measure in various manners, but the man cannot do without the world. Namely, the man can change, in some limits, the modes he can use the world, or the world allows the man to use it in various modes. The total contingency of the world to god it is shown out of the fact itself that the world has been created, freely, out of nothing.” (Stăniloae 2003: 374)

“The nature is thus structured then gives place to the human interventions, intervention which do not take in account the totality of the nature’s exact laws, and that these laws aren’t meant to give the most useful results by themselves, but they are completed through the human liberty. The meaning of the existence the people have it at a time or at another, the kind of their spiritual life, in their social interdependency, the nature of each one’s sentiments, it is combined with the exterior nature, or they make it whole in a way that makes impossible a real separation of their; or, that makes the separation to be rather on the abstract, imagined plan, a plan that is chosen also by the man’s spirit. The human imagination and creative freedom, it doesn’t move in the same way with the nature, although they do not contradict, in the majority of the cases, the effects produced by the nature’s laws, or they do not suppress the nature’s laws, but they use them in a way or another.” (Stăniloae 2003: 377-378)

“According to our faith, the materialization as real world of the rationality of the thought world, it is due to an act of creation from a supreme subject. This act equals the creation of the world out of nothing. That’s why, this materialization it always preserves in itself the mark of this nothingness and of the dependency on the supreme creator subject. Out of the mystery of the materialization are explained several mysteries: the birth of Jesus Christ without breaking the virginity, the endowing of the resurrected body with a soul, and some involvement of our body in our soul after death and before resurrection. This is because the materialization can be thinned and it can be thickened, depending on the spirit’s will which gives his rationalities the materialized form. We mention here that the creation of the souls it cannot be understood as a materialization of the souls out of God, as in the case of the material things. Because of this, the souls receive a real being of another rank. Relating to this, we must also specify that the rationalities of the things also receive a real existence, different from their thinking by God, when the things are created a materialization of their rationalities.” (Stăniloae 2003: 385)

“This insertion of the conscious and free in nature spirit, it cannot be but the work of a free Creator Who is above world. If the world as nature could have been the emanation of a non-free source, the world created for the embodied man – who is therefore a free and conscious factor who can make use of the world in a contingent manner and who can bring the world towards the state of a totally transparent and elastic environment for the dialogue amongst the human persons and between them and God as supreme Person - it cannot be but the work of an almighty, spiritual, and free Creator.” (Stăniloae 2003: 403)

“God freely creates the world in order to spiritualize it, to make it transparent for Himself. But God can do this through man, for he has inserted the free spirit within world through man. Through the human spirit inserted within world works the divine Spirit Himself in order to spiritualize the world, by His work in the man’s soul, but especially by His embodiment as man.” (Stăniloae 2003: 403)

“In a way, the common human nature is prolonged in the cosmic nature which is also common. That’s why, if the developing of the human communion means actualizing the character of human nature in the common nature, it must mean also actualizing the cosmic nature as common reality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 427)

“The world makes sense only by the fact that it can be led, being malleable, towards a mode of superior and eternal existence, towards the consummate truth of good, consisting in the love and in the union between world and God, between people and God, and amongst the people themselves; namely only if the world it is seen as a transparent environment, in a process of thinning towards the relation of full love between God and people and amongst the people themselves.” (Stăniloae 2003: 495)

“The world was created with the qualities corresponding to the purpose of being the basis of the superior gift of salvation. By falling, the world has become, though, mostly opaque, the withdrawal of the godlike Ghost out of it weakening the world’s feature of being a transparent environment between God and people and amongst the people themselves. Through the withdrawal of the ghost out of the world and out of the man, the world no longer has the original malleability, neither the man has that force of the spirit which to enable him to lead the world towards its full state of communication environment between God and man and between man and his fellow humans. The world still allows on each point of each causal series the choosing of some causal directions, and even the accomplishing of some effects, which overwhelm the effects staying in the power of the natural causality. But the world no longer gives the possibility of an easy using of its entire malleability, and amongst people rarely can be found some who can gain through effort so much spiritual force through their connection with the divine energy, than to overwhelm the natural causality itself, and who to open an exit and a view towards the future horizons of the full meaning of the existence, of the life's plenitude, of the good, and of the true spirituality." (Stăniloae 2003: 495-496)

We see the envious people make ugly the faces of the human persons and their things. They do not see the light coming to them from another plan. The persons' dimension towards infinite it remains hidden from them, likewise the transparency of the things towards the infinity of their ultimate Cause as Person. The big envious, satan, he cannot stand the world as beautiful and ordered work of God, and he brings only disorder into the world, and he is the embodiment of the ultimate ugliness. He hates not only the people but the entire world too, and he tries to impede the people to see the world's beauty, by trying to reduce the world to a simple object of inferior lusts and to a motif of strife. He attracts the people too, towards this image of the world, in order they to forget about God, about the depths of the spirituality and of the kindness." (Stăniloae 2003: 499)

"The people who do not let themselves to be tempted by satan, they finally discover the real greatness and beauty of the creation, in the same time with the unveiling of the godlike Ghost Who has turns back within them and within the world." (Stăniloae 2003: 499)

"Of course, either the good, or the light, either the connection with the source of the imperishable life, they haven't totally disappeared from the existence of the creation. The light has been continuing to lighten into darkness, the good has been continuing to ask his right in face of the human conscience and it has never renounced to fighting the evil. The kindness, the friendship, the noble aspirations, the hope for the person's immortality it has remained as a sun impossible to be totally covered by the fugitive and actually quite inconsistent clouds of the evil." (Stăniloae 2003: 507)

"By and large, the tragic state the world is in after the falling, it is not the consequence of an act of God, but the exclusive result of the Adam's deed. By no means, this state of pain and death it must be considered as a punishment God imposed it to Adam. God as love, he always works with love. The love doesn't create any evil. The slavery of Adam is the natural consequence of his defeat, his pain is the physiological result of his own traumatizing by deviating from his path and death is the result of getting far from God. Reckoning that God is the cause of the pain and of death it is an essential straying, it is a real insult addressed to Him. On soteriological plan it is a real heresy, for it deprives the Cross of Christ of its real historical and anthropological content, that of the victory upon satan, and it transforms the Cross in a simple instrument of pain and of taming the 'anger' of God." (Stăniloae 2003: 508)

"If the embodied Logos shows in Himself the gathered and transformed world, and he will bring the world to this state within all people who will unite themselves with Him, he can do this for he had a special connection with the world even before His Resurrection, a connection highlighted through people." (Stăniloae 2006: 15)

"What does God want with the world?" He wants to save the world, to bring it to an intimate relation with Himself as person, a fact that is being fulfilled into Christ. An ulterior interpretation of the presence of the Logos within world, through impersonal rationalities, as ontological grounds of the creation, an interpretation that was imposed by scholastics and by the whole philosophy of the last centuries and which depersonalizes the rationality (Kant, Hegel, etc.), it is about to be surpassed today even in the Catholic theology." (Stăniloae 2006: 16)

"God created the world in order to consummate it and not to let it eternally in a relative form. God didn't create the people only in order to consummate them one by one by crossing them through death, or in order to consummate only their soul, but to consummate them all and in their whole being, and therefore also in the body connected to the world's frame. Only thus the man will be fully consummate like man. Of this will consists also the ultimate fulfilling of the purpose of the intimate union with the Son of God with the world through embodiment and through His resurrection with the body, as part of the world. Only by bringing the world to consummation, God accomplishes the plan of the world's creation and of the world's deification in Christ, after through the help given by Him it has been accomplished in the present form of the world everything that was possible to be accomplished on earth in order to make the world transparent to its divine rationalities." (Stăniloae 1997: 237)

"God elevates the world in His eternal Kingdom, to a plenitude of life in which are shown the fully actualized, in a good sense, virtualities planted by Him through creation. But these virtualities cannot be actualized, in a good sense, by a man in isolation, but in collaboration with the other and in a work within the cosmic frame. That's why the human activity it has, as whole a meaning, a signification for the mankind's life on the plan of the eternal plenitude, by taking with it, there, in order to be made eternal, everything the mankind has achieved good on the historical plan. The faithful mankind isn't transported as a passive mass on the plan of the consummate and eternal life, but God has given the mankind the possibility of valuing through its solidary efforts too, its natural gifts from His and the help He has given the mankind during its the life on earth. Christ Himself has embodied Himself as man in history and He remains with us to the end of time, in order to lead us on this road of being elevated towards Him, in order us to grow up spiritually and to be imprinted by this growth while we are in the world, in an active dialogue with Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 238)

"The world become a consummate environment, an organ transparent to the godhead, it will unveil its untold beauties. The world partially unveils itself still from now, as beautiful, to the ones who, by using the grace received from the Church's Mysteries, they are spiritualized and they purify their sight and they see the things and the persons in a clean manner." (Stăniloae 1997: 267)

"The world will unveil after transfiguration, its full beauty, not only for it will be gilded by a light above any light, but also for that light will show all the world's beauties kept under darkness by the human passions and by the disturbance introduces in the world by passions. Only then the deep senses of the world will be unveiled, and the world's wonderful traits will be lightened. The intelligible world which the sensitive world will unite with, it is only the world of ideas and forms which the last one has been made according to, so that the union of those ones with it, it will make those ones transparent. The entire world will be transparent to its meanings, and to the harmonies of these meanings leading in the infinite of God, more fully than any present work of art. Properly-said, the genius works of art, created in history, are only pale hunches of what the entire world will be then. The whole world with its component will surpass then the state of being opaque. Saint Simeon speaks about spiritual flowers and he calls the entire world as spiritual and intelligible, no longer being a world of objects exterior to the persons. A song fully learnt by a person and long lived, it has become a soul's content, enriching, stabilizing, and vibrating the soul's life. Likewise does any work of art fully impropriated by somebody's spirit. But then the entire world will become an incomparably fuller giant work of art and a soul's content of untold beauty for everyone. It is maybe one of the meanings of the world's character as spiritual world. In the same time with this, the whole artistic creation which highlighted the world's beauties on earth, in which there was nothing to tempt towards sin, but it revealed the beauty of the world and of the persons, namely their authentic nature lighten by God, it will become a truly beautiful content." (Stăniloae 1997: 267-268)

"The human beings have been given to contemplate the godlike beauty in the material forms, by spiritualizing the material forms and by making them transparent. But in the present, due to the weakening of the spirit consequently to the sin, the human being only rarely can express the beauty hidden in words, in shapes, in sounds, and only rarely they can catch this beauty in artistic achievements, although both the human being and the whole creation are called together to praise the Lord, for knowing and revealing through the world His untold beauty. But as much as they can express in a form not-crooked by the impure temptation towards sin, it is a reflex out of the beauty irradiating out of the godlike source of the beauty, sometimes through the angelic world. (...) Through all the combination of colors, of images, of harmonious sounds, there are expressed the rationalities of the harmonies of the inexhaustible godlike beauty.” (Stăniloae 1997: 268-269)

“We are given the world in the phase of moral and spiritual construction as long as we are on earth in order all of us participating to this construction. But when the world has come to an end, nobody can participate anymore to this building up. Because of everything being finished then. We no longer have inequalities to level up, injustice to repair, or brotherhood to achieve. There we will rejoice of the happiness of the perfect communion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 297)

“This structure of the whole nature, distributed in genres and species, and accomplished through hypostasis, it shows that God created it to form a harmonious whole, chaired by the humankind, like a kingdom of love manifested between its members and God²⁵⁶.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But there are other features of this world which show this world’s appropriateness to a sinful mankind. The one who wants to maintain himself, and to reach a better situation, he must fight the people. But, in this way, nolens volens, he removes others from certain goods. We are not drawing out from here the extremely Protestant conclusion of H. Thielicke, for instance, that, in the actual form of the world, one cannot live without sin. But it is a fact that who wants to live without sin, he must suffer. There exists a certain nonconformity between the life of purity of somebody and the laws of this world.

The form of this world avenges itself, somehow with jealousy, on the one who doesn’t live according to its will.

Here is another cause of the forced death of Jesus. But, in general, the laws of this world grind all the people who live in its arena. It is an evil which consumes itself, manifesting in this too, the greatness of God.

Of course, even like the world is now, it reflects the wisdom and the greatness of God. In it reign a physical fit and a social order, which make the life possible - even the sinless life with some narrowing. The fact itself that its adaptation after the sin it was made in the sense that the sin is punished through everybody's death and through some sufferings, or it is limited through regularly reactions, it shows the godlike wisdom and the greatness, which leads the world.

²⁵⁶ From the Monotheistic conception or from the one of S. Bulgakov, one cannot draw such a conclusion, if the subject has come from outside into nature and he doesn’t receive his work from the nature. The work, like a transitory tension, it isn’t rooted into the nature of the reality itself.

Though, about a fit of the world for a happy life, without sin and without death, there cannot be the case, and this is the cause due to which the saved ones cannot live in the present bodies forever, neither can they resurrect, in other bodies, until the actual form of the world it doesn't entirely come to an end.

Only in accord with this truth it must be conceived the transfiguration of this Cosmos through the divine grace of the Holy Ghost. It is a transfiguration not into an overtly brightness, but under a veil of humbleness. At the surface, into a seen brightness, there reign all the forms affected by sin." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The world must be a free product of God's will. And, for the more a being is stronger the less He employs an external matter or His being in order to produce something, God, by creating the world, it is understandable that he exercised the highest form of power we can cogitate at, by not using anything external and neither employing His Being, but by bringing the world upfront through the simple manifestation of His will. This means that the world has been created out of nothing through His word, as manifestation of His will, but not as emanation of particles out of His Being. Consequently, in the world's constitution, and therefore in the man's constitution too, there doesn't enter anything out of the Being of God, as supreme reality, for He is not – and the mind cannot admit to be – an object carried away by the torrent of a power superior to Him. And the world's character as created, it excludes any identity with God – be it no matter how partial. The created reality cannot become uncreated through any evolution." (Stăniloae 1992: 15)

"Actually, the world appears to us like being in a process of continuous "eschatological parturition", as Maurice Blondel says, in which each part is determined by the entire universe, and it determines at its turn the whole, and "the relative fixity of the beings implies an unfolding having multiple phases which cannot be isolate from one another, without grave risks" (Blondel, L'Action: 316-317). The world's purpose, as the Holy Fathers said, it is to unveil the deified spirit. That's why, this solidary unveiling doesn't take place only in the closed system of the physical order, but it influences also the spiritual existence of the beings as persons, and their deeds too, which are generated by ideas and sentiments, and it influences the physical unfolding of the universe, as those persons influence each other too. In a word, the spiritual and the physical order of the created world take place in a solidary manner, through an inter-influence circulating throughout the whole physical and spiritual universe. Even the smallest gesture of ours, it puts the world in vibration and it modifies the world's state. In the same time, the existence of each person and of each thing is always depending on the convergence of the factors which are produced by the unfolding of the whole (Blondel, L'Action: 414).” (Stăniloae 1992: 24-25)

“The unfolding of the world it doesn’t take place randomly and isn’t lacking a target. One cannot do whatever he wants with the external world. Only by taking in account the possibilities and the natural laws from within nature, the man can subdue the world usefully. Shaping the nature for the human purposes is prefigures in the nature itself (...) This truth was formulated in even more appropriate terms by Saint Maximos the Confessor, when he said that in the created universe are hidden the divine rationalities, and our mission is that, through our action led by the rationality from within us, to fully highlight these rationalities and the harmony amongst them, which subordinates them to a major rationality. The technical civilization, by discovering one by one the nature’s energies and the laws of using them, it highlights increasingly many of these rationalities and increasingly vast connection amongst them, and the taste for harmony and aesthetics of the diverse civilizations, by shaping the nature as man’s environment, it makes these rationalities to be spread upon the things’ faces as a light. But because both the work of the human spirit who invents, and the physical movement from within world, are the wanted prolongation on the created plan of the uninterrupted and eternal act of the divine Rationality (Blondel, quoted work), we could say that the world’s unfolding on the line of the discovery of the rationalities from within world, it will last until God wants to keep the world in existence, and only in the harmonious frame which these rationalities are in the divine Logos. By the fact that in the rationalities from within things is reflected the divine Logos, the road we must walk until discovering and understanding - through the rationalities - the divine Rationality, it cannot be defined, for we cannot specify a term for the development of this world in all its possibilities. But if the purpose of this unfolding is that the man to see increasingly more the harmonious rays of the divine Rationalities spread upon the world’s face, as springing up from the things’ bosom, than it will be obvious that the man mustn’t cause amongst these rationalities an impossibility of coexistence (by polluting it, by exhausting the energy sources etc.).” (Stăniloae 1992: 25-26)

“To the work of developing the world in all its possibilities, work guided by the divine Providence, but done through the created conscious beings, everybody ought to participate. The Christian spirituality, far from sparing somebody of this collaboration, it imposes it to each one as a sine qua non condition in order to reach the consummation. From Evagrius Pontius, or even from Origen, to Saint Maximos the Confessor and further, the believer who wants to achieve the consummation, before reaching to be a γνωστικός he must be a πρακτικός. This is for one won’t become capable of seeing the rationalities from the things, and through these rationalities to see God-the Word, if he doesn't dedicate firstly to the "working philosophy", or to "fulfilling the commandments". (Stăniloae 1992: 25-26)

"Fulfilling the commandments" doesn't consist only of an activity directed upon nature, but in an activity that takes in account also our fellow human and ourselves. We do not have only the mission of unfolding the latencies situated within the physical nature, but also those latencies much more valuable and more spiritual ones existing in each of us. Through the attention, through the advice, through the teaching, through the example we are giving to somebody, by cooperating with him, we help to be actualized the spiritual potencies places in him and in us. And we work upon ourselves by disciplining our behaviors, by paying a relentless attention to everything we do and think, through the good we are doing to others. We do not meet Christ only within ourselves, but also in the fellow humans' beings. Saint Isaac the Syrian insistently asks us to accompany our prayer with the giving of alms and with the help granted to others. He says: "Nothing can bring my heart closer to God than the giving of alms does". Or: "If you have something more than you need for the day, share it to the poor and then come and bring your prayers daringly" (Word 23). Or: "Uphold with your word the sad ones and you will be upheld by that right hand that bears everything" (Word 30). And Saint Simeon the New Theologian says: "The Lord accepted to take upon Himself the face of any deprived man and to unite Himself with everyone, in order everyone by seeing his brother as God, to receive him and to reckon him as That One and to empty his riches in order to serve him, like Christ shed His blood for our salvation". And the Saint says again: "The one who thinks at God he honors every man, and he finds help through the hidden will of God. And the one who defends the oppressed one he has God as ally. And the one who offers his arm in order to uphold his neighbor he receives the arm of God to his help." (Word 23)." (Stăniloae 1992: 26-27)

"The world of the persons and of the things is meant thus to be ladder towards God, support during our ascending towards Him. But through passion the man removed this luminous depth from the world, this transparency going up to infinite. Instead of being a "horizon of mysteries", the world becomes a material consumable content, an impenetrable wall which isn't crossed though by any light from beyond. Actually, the bodily passions – the covetousness of the belly, the love for money, the fornication – they no longer keep from things and from persons except what is material in those, namely what can satisfy our body's lust; and the anger, the sadness, the vain glory are also explained by this reducing of the things to their limited aspect useful only to the body. The things are no longer except something to eat, or something that facilitates other pleasures to the body: they take the body quickly, they give the body pleasant fragrances and tastes, they present to the body a material shiny aspect, and they offer the body a comfortable rest; our fellow human's person is only a body, capable of offering our body pleasures, or a sum of horsepower, being such useful for producing pleasant things for our body. The things and the persons no longer comprise except what falls immediately under senses, and nothing from beyond senses. They have become opaque. The world has become unilateral, poor, without accents of any order than the sensitive one. The sin against God, against the creator Spirit, it is a sin against the world too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 117)

“This transformation of the things in simple consumable goods and this reduction of the persons to their aspect as objects, instead of making the man freer or more sovereign in the middle of the world, it has made the man the world’s slave, because of making him the slave of the overgrown bodily lusts. The brake which the Christendom urges the man to apply, it is the claiming, by man, of his rights in front of the inferior impulses which have overwhelmed him. Through the restraint that limits the passions, the man restores the leadership and the liberty of the spirit within himself. But by doing this, he awakens in himself the factor that sees in the world something more than simple objects satisfying his passions. Through restraint the man banishes away from him the veil of darkness and the man gives back to the world its feature as being transparent to the infinite. Therefore, in restraint the man doesn’t manifest a despise addressed to the world but he manifests his will of unveiling the whole world’s greatness; the restraint isn’t a total turning away from the world, in order to search for God, but it is a turning away from a world narrowed and thickened by passions, in order to find a transparent world that becomes itself a mirror to God and a ladder towards Him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 117-118)

“Between the true world and God there isn’t a report of reciprocal exclusion. But like a previous method in order to find the true world it is useful the turning away from the world, from the world fallen through the man’s guilt under the spell of the man, from the world that waits at its turn its liberation too.

Here, actually, part from each other the two roads of the Orthodox Christians, the two stages of the faith the Christians have been walking together until here: that of the fear of God and that of the repentance. The monks start walking on one of these two roads while the Christians living within world they walk on the other road.” (Stăniloae 1992: 118)

“No matter how much Saint Maximos the Confessor accentuated that the creation has only a passing importance to God, he some other times grants the creation an impassable importance, for its rationalities would persist also after the plain unveiling of God in the future life.” (Stăniloae 1992: 164)

“We could compare the world to a chamber full of all kinds of things, and the godlike glory to the sunlight. The darker is the chamber, the less are seen the things from within it. And the more it flows the light through windows the more the things from within the chamber could be seen clearer and more beautiful.” (Stăniloae 1992: 164)

“The rationalities of the things from the world, far from becoming useless after the uncovered seeing of God, they will help us understanding the fecundity of the divine Rationality, and they will even be an exemplification of the divine Rationality, like the sunrays are and exemplification and an manifestation of its light. Of course, then we will look directly at the Sun or the righteousness, or to His light, and only indirectly at the things’ rationalities, while now cannot see the direct gushing up of the sunlight but only its faded irradiation out of things. In other words, when we will contemplate God directly, we will contemplate the things’ rationalities directly in Him, and not in things, as we do now, so that these rationalities will be more illuminated, deeper, and more explained.” (Stăniloae 1992: 165)

“It is a main idea had by Saint Maximos the Confessor that the things hide within them the divine rationalities, as equally many rays of the Logos or of the supreme Rationality. The one who discovers these rationalities within things he ascends on their thread to knowing God and this knowledge must anticipate knowing God directly.

This teaching attributes to Creation and to the cogitation referring to Creation, a necessary role in the man’s ascension towards God. Saint Maximos is stranger to the theory of sight which we could reach at by avoiding the cosmos’s forms and laws. On the road of our getting closer to God it stays the world, which we must cross through the understanding of it. Each man has a mission relating to the world. Each man must know the world according to the power given him, and, because the knowledge cannot come except after achieving the virtues, each man must develop, previously, a moral activity relating to the world. A principled negative attitude towards the world it hinders our salvation itself. The world is imposed to each human being as a stone which he to sharpen his spiritual faculties on.” (Stăniloae 1992: 166)

“The Holy Fathers sustained, as the newer Orthodox theologians do too, that the penetration in the spiritual depths from beyond the natural world, it cannot be done on a rational way. To the world’s structure as symbol it relates to a symbolic knowledge, differing from the rational one. The rationality’s categories define, namely they set boundaries, and they discern something from something else. That’s why they are applicable only to the limited realities which differ from one another. By being infinite, inexhaustible, the godhead cannot be object to the rational determinations. The rationality fits only the natural world and not the spiritual world too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 167-168)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor sustained that out of the things’ rationalities “we know that God is the Maker of the seen things, but how God is we cannot understand” (Quaest. Ad Thalas., q. 51). From here and also out of the role attributed by Saint Maximos to the “rationality” in knowing these aspects of the things, which he also persistently called “rationalities”, it would turn out that this contemplation has a rational character. Then, ceaselessly, Saint Maximos asked the man who strives for consummation, to purify and to restore all his soul’s faculties, including his rationality. That’s why we said that the soul’s getting closer to God it cannot be done through a jump outside the rationality, but after a long exercising of the rationality in knowing the things’ meanings. That’s why the world has been appointed as our road towards God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 168)

“In its normalness the being is harmony and the harmony irradiated light. But on the normalness of a being it depends its integrity too, in the ensemble of the existence. That’s why we call the ensemble of the things form outside us as world, for the fact that it appeared to our ancestors as light (Lat.: lumen, E. l. t.’s. n.). The darkness is caused by non-existence, or by a disorder, and therefore by a weakening of the being. We do not know the darkness except as night. About disorder we know that it is a sufferance in existence, and the existence appears to be diminished, or mixed with the darkness, or as false light. From within that being it seems to flow out a darkness that stings, and it wounds the usual light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 294)

“Through the world the man grows up to the height of knowing God and to the height of being a partner to God. The world is a pedagogue towards Christ. Of course, the world can be a road to hell too. The world is the tree of knowing the good and the bad, the trial tree. If we contemplate the world’s beauty in order to praise its Maker, we will be granted the salvation; but if we think that this tree’s fruit is purely something to eat, we will lose ourselves. The salvation cannot be obtained in isolation but in the cosmic frame. This value of the world as road towards God it can be explained not only by the fact that the man must have an object of huge amplitude with the help of which he to strengthen his spiritual forces, but also out of the intrinsic structure of the world, as symbol of the divine transcendent reality. The symbol (in Greek language: to put together, to unite two things without confounding them) it is a seen reality that not only represents but also makes somehow to be seen through itself an unseen reality. The symbol supposes and shows, somehow simultaneously, two things. The symbol id “the bridge between two worlds”, as somebody said. The word, for instance, it is the symbol of the spirit, by uniting without confounding and by simultaneously presenting the materiality of a sound with the meanings of a cogitation; the human face does alike, by making transparent the spirit from within man, through the face’s materiality, and, in the case that the man lives in God, it will show God Himself.” (Stăniloae 1992: 166)

“God is an inexhaustible reservoir of spiritual energy open to the world and the world is capable of being open in its deep intimacy to this energy. The intimate openness of these two internal to one another realities, it makes them to be, in a sense, as some kind of unity. The world is open to God, God is open to the world, but each of them keeps the own freedom. That’s why, the world can also lock itself to God. But not on all plans. There are channels which God communicated His energy through, to the world. For instance, He communicated the world the energy which the world is preserved through; but only whether the world wants it, He can communicate to the world the transfiguring energy, through the man’s mediation.” (Stăniloae 2005: 11)

“The world and the things from within world haven’t lost for us their function of symbols by and large. A contrary, the coming of the Word into body, it has placed God in an even more intimate relations with the entire world and the things have become even more transparent to the presence of God. Besides that, the unseen Christ communicating Himself to us through some sensitive means, through some things and gestures which have received a special symbolic character, God communicating Himself through them, to us, in a more accentuated manner than through the prophetic symbols of the Old Testament.” (Stăniloae 2005: 74)

“There are two different visions concerning the world, one constituting the basis for idolatry, and another for considering the world it its entirety as symbol or as basis for symbols. Only the Christendom, following to the Old Testament, it sees the world as a symbol and as basis for symbols, for only the Christendom sees the world as relative, only to the Christians the world isn’t an object of idolater worshipping, for to Christian the world isn’t the ultimate reality, but beyond it there is a symbolized by it, world.” (Stăniloae 2005: 90)

“It doesn’t suffice that the seen world not to be the only one in order to be considers as symbol, but it also must the other world symbolized by it to be in a connection with the seen world, namely to resemble to that one, to be an image of it. And the seen world will have this quality only if it dependent on that one, namely if it isn’t in an independence from it. This relation is had by the seen world only as one that is created, certainly, by the other world. Only in such a case the seen world resembles to the unseen world, and as well due to the fact that it is environment for the other world’s manifestation. Our body is like our soul, for our body is the environment which our soul manifests itself in, for the fact that our body, in a certain measure, it is organized, or it is created, by our soul. Of course, the world in its ensemble, it isn't equally necessary and equally tied to the unseen world as our body to our soul, but the unseen world is freer from the seen world. This is for the seen world is created in an absolute mode, not only according to its form but also to its substance, by the unseen world. But just this, on the other hand, it gives the seen world an even bigger dependency on the unseen world, more than that, the body has on the soul. The transcendence can dispose on the seen world, even more, as its instrument. It is true that our soul by being tied to the body, in the most intimate and necessary mode, it has made of body his most adequate instrument of its manifestations, of his powers. But the soul pays for this through a renunciation to a part of his freedom relatedly to the body, given the fact that the soul hasn't created the body according to the substance too." (Stăniloae 2005: 90)

"Related to the divine transcendence, the seen world isn't an equally adequate environment as the body is to the soul, but, on the other hand, the divine transcendence has the full liberty from the world it created. The divine transcendence uses all the things from the world in order to manifest itself, but it manifests in a much more adequate mode than the soul manifests through the body. Sometimes, God uses the world's matter in order to pronounce through it, words like the human words, or in order to form to Himself a face; those aren't and equally necessary and adequate form as they are to the human sou. But, by and large, God manifests Himself through the world, through the usual forms of the world's existence, way more adequately in order to present the divine life." (Stăniloae 2005: 90-91)

"This report as from creature to Creator, it specifies the connection of our world with the unseen world. Only the fact that the seen world is the creature of the unseen God, it makes the world having also the meanings from God and to serve to express God." (Stăniloae 2005: 91)

"While the world can be also symbol for the divine transcendence and basis for the restricted symbol of religious character, but also divinized reality and basis for idols, the cause which the world receives this last meaning for, and which an image from within world becomes an idol for, it isn't the world itself, or the respective image, but it is the state of the man who has lost his tension towards transcendence, who has lost the momentum of surpassing the material things, which is characteristic to the human spirit. The cause consists of a spirit's falling from the life characteristic to him. In this state was the idolater mankind and in this state is every man who has fallen from the faith in a God Who is transcendent to the world. The Spirit is outside time and space. "The spirit is, in the same time, transcendent and immanent. In the spirit the transcendent becomes immanent and the immanent becomes transcendent, and it crosses over the border". The spirit isn't ever content with what he is, with what he has become, and with what he has achieved, and that's why the spirit always jumps over the border he has reached, but not through a natural evolution (...), but through freedom, by being attracted by the values which the spirit thinks at and he strives to incorporate them in his life and in the world's life." (Stăniloae 2005: 95-96)

"The whole world is, in its being, and it can become to the man, the transparent environment for the transcendence, so that the man is able to intuit the transcendence through the world. The whole world is, so, in its being, a symbol. But the man must discover this world's character as symbol. This was said by the Holy Fathers and it is said also by the modern thinkers. The Holy Fathers expressed the world's transparency to the divine transcendence, in the teaching regarding the "divine rationalities" irradiating out of all the world's things." (Stăniloae 2005: 96)

"At the Holy Fathers was created a special symbolic vision upon the world, like to the churchly hymnographers and at the symbolist poets was created an own symbolistic language. The theology of the classical writers of the Church it was creative and daring, for in the mood of their mind, in their perceiving of the world, and in their language, they were closer to understanding the Bible and the Gospel, and closer to the Prophets', to the Apostles', and of the Lord Himself way of speaking. Ant this whole way of speaking was crossed through by that symbolism which we've spoke about. The Holy Father didn't see only the surface of the phenomena, but they as well saw their roots, namely their godlike principle. At the Holy Fathers we do not notice objectivation; at them there wasn't abstraction. (...) To this realism of the Orthodoxy it corresponds, fully, the teaching about the uncreated energies, about these traces of God within world. It is a teaching fully clarified by Saint Gregory Palamas. But Saint Gregory Palamas followed, in the conception about the world's report with God, the line of the previous Churchly writers. He said about this: "God built this seen world, as a reflection of the world from above world, for reaching by spiritually contemplating this world, as on a wonderful ladder, that world from above." (Stăniloae 2005: 97)

"The entire world will be a symbol on two ways: a) the way which any object and phenomenon can symbolize any other object and phenomenon in, according to the convention amongst people, and it can also signify God to a rational cogitation, on the basis of the causal reports hinting to that. And this is in the virtue of the fact that "nothing stands by itself, but all of them are reports"; b) the mode which any of the things or any phenomenon can be a symbol in, as a cypher which is contemplated through the transcendence and not another thing of phenomenon. Here the thing is no longer seen in its causal reports, but it is seen in its depth, in its mystery, and that hasn't anything to do with its natural reports with other things, but it is a place of the transcendence's presence. As cypher, the respective thing is no longer seen as framed in the natural determinism and by that being a natural symbol, but it is seen now as a metaphysical symbol." (Stăniloae 2005: 98)

"The world's life isn't the own life of God." (Stăniloae 2005: 107)

"The whole universe is a light. But the universe's light wouldn't have been known if the human conscience hadn't existed. My world would have been, in such a case, a meaningless light. There must exist the people's consciences in order to know the universe's light. I must know the universe through my conscience. But my conscience needs the conscience of my fellow human too. Their conscience gives my conscience surety, and it enriches it. The child starts knowing on himself since the beginning, and he is helped by the conscience of the people from around him; during the whole his life the man is imprinted and enriched in his knowledge upon the world, by increasingly numerous fellow humans he gets to know orally or in writing, and even by fellow humans from far away, or who live far in the past. Each person knows even on himself, by knowing others or by receiving from them the knowledge, and by knowing increasingly more, the universe, with the help from others. A meaning of the word con-science is this too: I know about myself also by receiving their communicated to me knowledge about myself. In what another says about me, I also find what I live within me, or I find a completion to what I know about me. Or, through both of them, I complete and I correct on myself. Through my sayings towards another, and of his towards me, we actualize, we unveil, and we develop our common human nature. I am non-separated from others, though I am not confounded to them, and though we aren't identical in the way we see everything. This fact shows, at its turn, that all the people are of same nature, and that the physical universe is common to us and it feeds, materially and spiritually, our human nature. But each one's conscience differs from another's, and also from the common physical universe. That's why, it doesn't suffice to reciprocally notice one another neither to notice ourselves in the body of the physical universe, in order to know about one another and in order to know the things' rationalities, but we must communicate to one another the thought and the understanding of the universe, with diverse contributions, in order to really know one another and to better understand the universe's rationalities and they common meaning, a meaning that is of an untold richness. I have in common with my fellow human everything from within me and from within the world, but I have also in an individual manner, as person, as each one of my fellow humans have too, for we are enriched together but without being confounded to one another." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 27-28)

"The world isn't annulled because of Christ being absent from within it, neither the life from the world becomes "death" because of that. The world and the life within world, they remain as a possible transparent for Christ environment; through the world and through the life it can be communicated to the man who believes in Christ: “the Light of the world”, as meaning of the world; the world and the life remains a possible path towards the full union with Christ. To the believer, Christ becomes as light of the world and of the life, unveiling him the real value of the world and of the life in the world, but only for Christ brings, to the world and to the man within world, a value which neither the world nor the man have it in themselves, but they are only able to receive it. To the believer, Christ banishes away the darkness from the world, namely from the life of the man living within world, or Christ makes the life of the man living within world to be a preparation for the eternal life in Christ, a preparation helped by Christ Himself. This is because without Christ the world is a world of the darkness and of the death. Therefore, when the world, within which Christ isn’t seen, it appears to us as darkened, and meaningless, when Christ is seen within the world, as it is due, it shows that is capable for being Christ seen through it, in order Christ to become the world’s luminous light. The Word of God created the world capable of being Christ made known through it. The Word of God Who created the world He keeps the world further in existence, with His power, but, if there is no real communication with Him, the world will be “death”. (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 48-49)

“God created the world through His Son, out of nothing, in order to fill the world up, through the man, with the happiness of the relation with God, and in order the man to make the world eternal, by deifying it. If a man refuses this purpose given by the Son of God - Who has made Himself man in order to make it easy for the man -, to that man the world remains meaningless. If the world had been out of divine essence, or if the world had been the ultimate reality, with its miseries and with its death, on the basis of an intrinsic law mastering him, the man wouldn’t have been able to elevate himself above a meaningless existence leading to death. Only if God is a Person-God of the love, having a being differing from the world’s being - namely a limitless godlike being -, and God created the man as the one who, through His wanted and free love, to unite himself with God and to use the world created by God on his level, for this union, only thus the man and the world could escape the miseries coming to them; this last variant takes place when the man refuses the union with God. The possibility given by God to the world, to be transparent for God so that the man could see God through the world, to see the embodied God into the eternal life, it isn’t accomplished when the man doesn’t see God through the world even in this life on earth. Then the man remains in “death”, despite developing a “scientific” thinking that can deceive him, as a false light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 49-50)

“Through the resurrection of Christ, we have been shown that this world and this world’s history, they aren’t locked up in themselves, but they are a preparation for the eternal life, and they can be spiritually overcome. We’ve been shown the fact that the free mastery upon matter it isn’t shown only in wonderful and exceptional deeds.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 106)

“The godlike light will overwhelm the material matter of the resurrected bodies and it will make them to be noticed by others, in the future life, as being really present everywhere, through will and love, for they will be in the same light of Christ and they will be like the Christ’s body Who before His Ascent he appeared in diverse places. The possibility of being ones with others in the same body of Christ it means also the each one’s possibility to make the whole universe as content of his own self into Christ, together with all the other ones, though each one of them imprinting his own seal on it and, thus, enjoying what means each one for every other one, not only as personal love, but also a mode of seeing the universe and of seeing Christ as being present in all things, as springing out light, a light spiritually felt or seen as being His light, a light that elevated and consummates everybody’s light. The distances are surpassed by the ones who are in Christ’s light, namely within Christ Himself Who comprises all the things in the light of His body. All the one who will be fully dressed up in Christ, they will be united at the final judgment and then forever, by looking at Christ and by looking at one another. And the world as become a perfect organ, an organ transparent to the godlike light, transparent to His presence, but also an organ of the love amongst people and of their getting along, it will unveil its hidden beauties unseparated from the godlike and from the human beauties. The godlike light will show all the world’s beauties kept into darkness by the human passions, a darkness showing now, within world, rather the things which satisfy the man’s bodily and egotistic lusts.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 133-134)

“The saved human persons will be close to one another, and into Christ Who comprises the whole universe with the light of His body. The world will show its beauties which have been kept before, in darkness, by the human passions. Then, each human person liberated from the egotism narrowed through the bodily passions, he will extend, in the light of Christ, his sight over the whole universe, and he will deepen his sight into universe’s beauties highlighted by Christ’s light. While each person will see the universe’s richness and depth in the light of the resurrected body of the Creator Word, he will live in the spiritual intimacy of his own subject non-separated from the others’ subjects, the universe’s richness unveiled by the loving light of Christ, lives the same, but live by each person through Him, in the intimacy of His Person, not-separated through love from the intimacy as persons, of the believers. The whole world will become then transparent for Christ, unveiling its always enriching meaning, meanings important for the communion amongst people and deepened through the Creator and Savior Word, in its meanings leading towards the godlike infinite. (...) The whole world will be shown as spiritual, no longer being a world of objects external to the persons, though won't be either a simple subjective reality. (...) Then the world will become incomparably fuller, a great work of art and, as such, a content of the person's soul of an untold beauty, to everyone. In that world the persons will live one another in their happy closeness and communion and in their reciprocal richness. The world will become then of a great beauty and a content of the clean communion, for the incorruptible bodies no longer will need the world for a consumption and for bodily pleasures, and that's why the people will no longer fight for dividing it, and so the world won't be them, any longer, cause for enmity and sinful feeling. How much communion is in a searching for a common deepening of a meaning of the existence! The world from then won't have anything to incite to fight for satisfying some individual lusts or of some egotistic passions, but the world will be revealed as an environment for clean love and for loving work of God as Person, or as means for clean and happy communion amongst people and between people and God, and the people will have as fully assimilated the world within their interpersonal love, in the world's pure wonder. The whole world will be then an increasingly enriched content, unveiling others and others depths of God, and expressing others and other nuances of its living into Him by the multitude of the human persons advancing spiritually, through the world's mediation, and through the communion amongst people, into God. That's why that world will be eternally new, and the people will be eternally young, being always in a beginning of joy and of knowledge, always wanting to progress within world. Those people's life won't be bored because of the monotony imposed by the repetition for the same rigid laws, namely it won't get old, like their bodies too, always full with a spirituality increasing its powers, it won't be led to decomposition. As in the life from before sin and death, the body was always new in its spiritual feelings, likewise will feel also into Christ." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 135-137)

"The universe itself, with the insufficiencies of the satisfactions it can give us, and through the pains it causes to us, but also through the obvious perishable character of our life in universe, it urges us to transcend the universe, but we mustn't totally break with the universe as long as we live in it. That transcending is, on the other hand, a condition of the human being's spiritual strengthening. This means that the human being must ascend beyond universe, after he has used everything good the universe has given him, but he also has crossed through the temptations which the universe keeps him through, tied to it, and it brings him downwards. The human being must know the universe's importance as road which the human being ascends beyond universe. But the human being must have too, the strength to reckon the universe only as a road. It is dangerous reckoning the universe as everything that you can get. It is something else to renounce to the universe you knew than to renounce to a universe you didn't know." (Stăniloae 1995: 121)

"The wonderful correspondences of the powers from within universe to the increasingly higher needs of the people, they can motivate us to consider the universe as an ultimate, or opaque, reality. In no case one can overlook the universe's insufficiencies. The dissatisfactions, the illnesses, and the death, they are proofs that the universe isn't the ultimate reality, and also of the fact that the universe hasn't remained in tight communication with the Creator. There is also the variant of considering that the universe has in itself everything we want, but we still do not know all universe's resources. But, despite all progresses in discovering new resources, these ones do not remove the universe's insufficiencies. That's why, it is more justified to reckon that the wonderful order of the things, matching the people's life in the present body, it urges the mind to transcend towards a wise and almighty Maker of the universe and Providence Provider: and the insufficiency of the universe in satisfying all the human being's aspirations, likewise, it urges to such transcending towards God as target, and towards the people who want to advance by preparing themselves for the communication with God Who will give them everything. The universe has the importance and also the insufficiency of a road which doesn't offer you, by itself the resting, but that keeps you in the toil of advancing towards resting, a toil that shows us that we must prepare ourselves too, for it. As such, the universe appears us like a road that we must walk on, and that we must cross over it at its end, which is the death, to the endless resting. And it is good the human being to see the world not only as useful to the body - because the body brings the human being to death - but to see it also as a road towards what is beyond universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 122)

"The material universe proves to be an environment of the transcending also by the fact that it is an environment for communications, either through the direct power of the spirit, or through simple of technical material means. Even through material or technical means, the people communicate their thoughts, their feelings, their wills, and their plans, though they still remain at distance, because of not being able to give to one another the whole their living power. But in both these forms, the material universe itself, it is an environment connecting the people spiritually. Like the people communicate spiritually through their bodies, likewise, or due to that, they communicate spiritually through the material universe. The spirit present within body, he extends his power upon universe too. But it is different the power exercised by the human being, at distance, through the godlike Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 123)

“When the human being understands the universe as only answering some strictly material needs, not only that the universe becomes opaque and it is covered by a mist impeding the spiritual sight, but the universe also become a means of division amongst people, each one trying to grab increasingly more of it, by treating the universe as a prey. This is because the body, seen as a purely material organization, cannot be communicated through anything else, but it can only be absorbed even more within the seen universe as non-transparent material matter. In such a case, the people no longer meet one another in the same understanding of what is shown through universe, as plan of individualizing existence, capable of providing a common enrichment, better said a communitarian enrichment, of the human beings from within universe.

In this case the universe is no longer a road and a transparent environment, attracting all people in common, but it is an ultimate and opaque prey, which each individual or group fight for biting an as big as possible chunk from.” (Stăniloae 1995: 124)

“The mankind’s falling, in the state of seeing the universe as a prey, it took place immediately after the beginning of universe’s existence, through the exclusive attachment to what “has a good taste and it is pleasant to the sight”, by reckoning that the universe consists only of this, likewise the whole knowledge about good and evil.” (Stăniloae 1995: 124)

“The human being mostly existed the connection with the source of his spiritual content, which held his body as incorruptible and immortal, and it determined the universe too, which no longer communicates its spiritual content to him, content which the universe is transparent to, to coved this content and to obey the process of corruption (Rom. 8: 20-22). The human being’s deeds, directed towards others, are no longer good deeds, or brotherhood, but they are evil deeds, full of enmity, or they are only apparently good. The exclusive connection of the human being through his body, with the universe, it makes the spiritual desert from within the human being to be extended within universe too, or it makes the universe to no longer be seen as transparent to a spiritual content (Rom. 8: 20).” (Stăniloae 1995: 124-125)

“The spiritual content from within man it hasn’t been totally lost but, partially, it has been perverted, and partially it has remained as a powerless nostalgia. This makes the man not to feel himself as satisfied within universe, except partially, in his body that has become mortal, and to wait for his soul’s true satisfying, after his death with the body, when he hasn’t totally lost the feeling of this spiritual content, and for himself as whole human being, to wait for the full satisfying in a mode of the universe’s existence, from after the end of the present mode of universe’s existence.” (Stăniloae 1995: 124-125)

“Only by transcending the present mode of universe’s existence, by hope, it can give the human existence a meaning.” (Stăniloae 1995: 125)

“The human being, as made for gathering the universe within himself, he must gather it not as an opaque universe, that is locked up in itself and it locks the human being up too, but he must gather the universe as one that he exceeds, unveiling the Creator in the universe’s transparency, and the universe’s capacity of placing the human being in connection with God. The human being must be of universe and he must exceed the universe too. The universe must be to the human being only a road he needs, bringing the human being to even more light. The human being isn’t “thrown within universe” as Heidegger said, but he is placed into universe as on a road which he advances towards God through, God being the target of this road, the man following to reach at God with everything he has learnt as good content, within universe, but also through the habituation of not seeing the universe as the ultimate reality.” (Stăniloae 1995: 125)

“To the human being’s transcending towards his fellow human and towards God, he is also served by the words the human beings tell to one another, about things, but in the mode which each one places inside the things what he has within, as superior to the things; impeding the transcending it has as cause the liar use of words, given that the lie comes out from the human being who is locked up within universe and within himself. The human being speaks for he is a person connected to another person.” (Stăniloae 1995: 125)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor clarified the meaning of human being’s life in universe. The human being is a pilgrim in universe, advancing in the increasingly clearer light irradiating from the Holy City, and not a convicted human being destined to get lost within universe. The human being lives in universe and in time, but he is also above universe and above time, being him elevated, in this sense, increasingly higher, and he elevating, at his turn, the universe, increasingly higher. At his death, the human being parts with the universe, but he takes with him everything he has gained as good spiritual content, or a transparent mode of universe’s existence. By doing so, the human being has prepared himself to have the universe with him, again, at resurrection, but in a transfigured manner. The human being is a meteoric being. The human being takes the entire universe towards the border between corporality and God. If somebody keeps the bread surplus for himself, that bread will get spoiled. By giving that surplus to the one in need, he gains that human being for God, but himself too, he is spiritualized and he fills up the bread’s matter with the spirit’s light, or, in other words, he fills up the bread’s corporality with God. That’s why, the Orthodox believers, by bringing at the Church, everything they are going to give, as gifts, to the people, in order those things to be sanctified, they show the connection between sanctification and giving as gift. They believe, rightly so, that the coat they have given as a gift to a poor man, it waits for them at resurrection. It is affirmed here the perspective of the transfiguration of the entire universe, not to say about the imprinting of believers by the good deeds he has done, those deeds giving them a luminous countenance, or a countenance of glory. The Kingdom of God, or the Kingdom of the consummate communion, it will mean communicating together everything the human beings will have, as state which they are rePreparing themselves for even from here. If the human beings hadn't had the universe, on one hand, as responding to some identical needs, and on the other hand, as a gift which they can to give to one another, how would the universe has served to accomplishing this perspective? By this, the people form common notions too, in order to communicate their thoughts about their common universe, or in order to unveil the universe to one another, as a common content of their life. The One Who has given the human beings the universe as a common gift, He has also given them their common notions, or their capacity of composing those notions in order to speak about universe. The more the universe is increasingly common to them, by lovingly giving it to one another as a gift, the less they contradict on one another, and the less they cheat on one another by using words." (Stăniloae 1995: 125-126)

"In their state from before their falling, the human beings saw the universe as saint, for there were absent the egotistic and bodily passions within them. That's why, in order to sanctify the universe and the material things, we must tend to the detachment from the addiction to the things, by giving them, as gifts, to others. The things when given as gifts, they no longer are seen in a passionate mode. The most radical mode which the man sanctifies on himself in, it is the self-sacrifice. Thus, the universe is useful to our salvation, not so much by despising it, but rather by using the material things from universe as gifts towards others, or as means which we communicate through, our love for them. And we sanctify at maximum our life, not by renouncing to it because our disgust for it, but by using our life in order to increase the love amongst people.

By this, the universe gains again the transparency to God, which it had in the state before falling. If the universe has been given us by God as a gift for everybody, we mostly use the universe in this quality of it, by easily making the things as our gifts towards others, and by this we show that, actually, the things have been given by God to everybody. Then we see God beyond things, as their Giver to everybody. Then we transcend the things without reckoning their existence as inutile. God Who has given us the things as gifts for everybody, He teaches us by that, to use the things, at our turn, as gifts amongst us, and not to hide this role of the material things, as mediators of love amongst us, a role imprinted by God within them, as things meant to pass, out of love, from person to person. Like God has shown His love for us and His will that there to be love amongst us, by giving us the material things as gifts for everybody, likewise we must show our love for one another, by using the material things as gifts amongst us. The material things, far from being opaque walls and causes of division and of hatred amongst us, as when they lose their character as bridge of God's love for us and of our love amongst us, in this case they accomplish their role which they have been given us with, by becoming means of brotherhood amongst us. By this, we make ourselves, in the same time, as masters upon the material things, namely we no longer are their servants. This is because the material things master upon us through our egotistic, but only apparent, domination upon things. By giving the material things as gifts, through them we unite ourselves with our fellow humans, by exceeding on ourselves; and we are united with God, through the material things, through the same exceeding. In this case, the material things become transparent to God, as their loving Giver, and we become too, as transparent to one another. When I look at a thing given me as a gift, by another person, I see that person through that thing. When I see the things as gifts given by God, I see God in those things. The need for giving the things as gifts, it is expressed by Christians by marking the sign of the cross upon the material things. This is for the cross, it means: renunciation, means restraint, means removal of passions, means liberation from passions, and means to be elevated to God. And in assuming the cross, we have the Son of God as role model of us. The cross means transcending upon the material things and upon ourselves, towards God, it means transcending from our own person towards another, as seen in the light of God. Only the cross, as restraint, and the reciprocal sacrifice out of love, only they can unite us in God. Through cross, Christ has shown us the whole His love: by impropriating his cross, we also show our cross to Him and to our fellow humans. A universe without cross, it would have been a non-transparent universe, an ultimate reality which we attach ourselves to, with egotistical avidity, as not having anything above the material universe. Through cross we give ourselves and the universe to one another, and to God. That's why the cross makes us and it makes the universe too, as transparent amongst us and to God. The cross makes the universe as transparent and easily to exceed, between human being and human being, by becoming they too, as transparent to God. The cross sanctifies the universe, and it sanctifies us, for nothing passionate defiles any longer, our reports with the universe; nothing egotistical locks us up any longer, within world and within ourselves, unlike in case we see ourselves and the universe as material and ultimate realities." (Stăniloae 1995: 129-130)

"The universe becomes transparent to God also through the insufficiencies of its resources in order to unlimitedly satisfy, as it was thought, the ever-increasing needs of everybody. This shows the universe as created out of nothing and it shows the human being as representing a border too, to another human being, the people forbidding on one another in their attempt to extend, endlessly, their greediness. The spiritual communication and the greediness' limitation, they go hand in hand. This imposes to the human being a new motif for ascesis. On the other hand, the impossibility of providing the energies necessary to his new needs, it increasingly imposes, more than ever in the past, a work in common, as another urge to communion, intertwined with restraint and toil. The desire for satisfying its increased material needs, during time, by using new necessary energies, it makes, on the other hand, unusable some of the existence means which were previously easily accessed by people. This is a new warning given to the people towards restraining the too big need which the people have become accustomed to satisfy. The will for widening the borders which limit the people by and large, it highlights other limitations of the creation's possibilities. By all of these, it is shown the fact that the creation it allows a continuous development of the people on the spiritual plan, through the communion amongst them, and through the increasing of their union with God, but this development must be reconciled with a restraint of the bodily needs, that promotes, at its turn, the spiritual development. These are new meanings of the cross placed within creation." (Stăniloae 1995: 130)

"The Whole cosmos is shown as tied to us, not only for our existence in this material body, but also for our spiritual and eternal existence. We transcend the universe's state from now, but we do not annul the universe, but we use the universe as transfigured by the loving energy of the Holy Trinity working within us, towards our spiritualization and salvation. Through universe we ascend towards Christ, or we find Christ through universe, and through Christ we find the Holy Trinity. By this, the universe itself is being sanctified and it is made as means for our sanctification, or for our union with the Holy trinity and amongst ourselves. This shows us that during the whole our life, which we must use the universe in, we must transcend, on the other hand, the usual state of the universe in order the universe to become increasingly transparent to God, and increasingly filled up with God's power and light, and increasingly communicative of God's power." (Stăniloae 1995: 207-208)

"The Holy Trinity prepares us for, at the end of the universe's present way of existence, to receive the pouring of the Trinity's love, but also the entire cosmos to receive that love, in order all the things to come in communication with the Trinity and amongst themselves, in order all the things to be united within Trinity, with the Persons of the Holy Trinity. This is the eternal Kingdom of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost Whom all the ones who believed in, they will be made as sons of the Father and as brothers of the Son, full of Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 208)

“By and large, the people must meet one another, while using the universe, amicably. They must help on one another in using the universe, and not to become divided. The people must join the personal use of the universe with the reciprocal help. Instead of making of the use of the universe a motif for fighting, let them make of this an occasion for manifesting and for increasing their love. All the people must live, in this concern too, as subjects, and therefore they cannot live except in reciprocal respect, on collaboration, in loving cherishing, and in reciprocal giving of the universe’s things. In order each human being to live on himself, and also in order to live on other as subject, it is necessary to live as a community of subjects, by admitting that each one needs other in using the universe’s things. This is because the universe cannot be mastered except by many people together. God Himself said at plural: “Grow up and multiply and fill the earth up and master it.” (Gen. 1: 28).” (Stăniloae 1995: 120)

“There is necessary a certain exceeding of the universe, but without attempting a total detaching from it as a whole. The universe, as objective reality, it is inferior to the human being, but in the same time it is necessary to the human being as such a reality. The universe participates too, to be noticed by the human being. As such, the universe urges the man to exceed the universe, but in the same time the universe ties the human being to itself. If the universe ties the human beings too tightly, it can also divide them, and that’s why, on the other hand, we mustn’t absolutize the universe in order the people to be able to truly be connected to one another, through universe.” (Stăniloae 1995: 120)

“The communication doesn’t consist only of making ourselves know and present to others, but also in self-giving, more or less, to others. They human beings give themselves, as gifts, spiritually, through the universe’s material means; by giving some of their material things, as gifts, to one another, the human being given to one another, as gift, a spiritual feeling, as when they give a glass of water or a piece of bread. Most often, the human beings imprint their work in the things they give as gifts; the bread they give as gift it bears within a work of the givers; the grapes likewise. That’s why, the gift the people give to one another, as things processed by them, are things which communicate spiritually the thought imprinted within them, and the feeling of attention and of love. Thus, the universe connects the human being through good deeds too: deeds of love, deeds of mercy, and deeds of cherishing. This is a new mode which the people transcend themselves in, one towards another, through the material universe.” (Stăniloae 1995: 123)

“If the world hadn’t been created, then it would have been existed by itself, and if the world had existed by itself from ever, all its insufficiencies would have been part of the it, namely everything we reckon as evil: the fight, the enmity, the killing, they would have come out of the same essence of the world, as also what we consider as good: the friendship, the truth, the reciprocal understanding etc. In such a case the difference between those ones it would have been totally relative, or only in words.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24)

“If the world had been existing by itself from ever, then there wouldn’t have been existed a Creator of the world superior to the world Who has in Himself a true perfection, and Who can make us too, after our death, partaker to an eternal life, without the pains and the sighs caused to the people by living in this life, pains and sighs which the people inflict upon themselves, because they have broken their communion with God Who is the Source of the consummate and truly good life. If the world had existed by itself and without being created, the human beings would have appeared and disappeared one after another, definitively, after enduring, for a while, the life submitted to a meaningless agitation. In such a case everything would have been a meaningless unfolding, a purposeless one, one without explanation and lacking any light of the meaning, namely a blind movement.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24)

“If the world has been created by a superior Being, the One conscious and really consummate and eternal, then That Being must have had a reason to create the world. The world hasn’t come out of a blind, involuntary essence, because if that had been the case the world would have been necessary to that essence and the world’s imperfection would have belonged to that essence’s imperfection. In such a case wouldn’t have been anywhere a perfect reality, with an absolute power in itself, a power which the all-luminous conscience and the full freedom cannot lack from.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24)

“By being the work of a Tri-Personal God, or by being created through the word or through the rationality of a God-Person, the world bears within itself the imprint of the rationality. This imprint is being borne by the man too. And even more than that, while the world bears the imprint of a rationality, as an object, the man bears in addition to the imprint of the rationality as object to be known, also the imprint of a subjective rationality, or a knower rationality, showing himself by this as being in the image of the Word or of the Son of the Father, namely as a being placed through Them in a dialogue with the Father, together with the Son. So, the man is elevated in the internal dialogue of the Holy Trinity, the supreme dialogical and loving existence. Only this possibility of the man confers the man and the world a meaning: the world is a content of the dialogue between man and the God in Trinity, or, through the world the man grows up in understanding and loving God, the One Who gives the world, as gift, to the man, out of His love, in order Him to have the man as partner of a dialogue of the understanding and of the love. The rationality imprinted within creation by the godlike Word, on the account of the man's knowledge, it makes the world as illuminated by a meaning, it makes the world itself as "light", a fact expressed in Romanian language by the word "lume" (Lat. lumen).¹ (Stăniloae 1995, I: 25)

"As the body becomes opaque, in same time with the body the world become opaque too, one noticing within the world only the repetition of the same laws. The world becomes transparent when it is seen as work created and upheld by a supreme loving Subject, as gift of His love for us. The world becomes transparent when, by seeing it as gift from God for all of us, we use the world's things as gifts amongst us. By this, the world appears to us, on one hand, as destined to obey us; on the other hand, we see ourselves as tied to the world, and on the other hand as attached to the world; on one hand, the world is inferior to us, while on the other hand, the world is valuable for the reports amongst us and even for our spiritual forming, and the world doesn't depend on us in its existence, duration, and organization. The world becomes a transparent road, through love, towards our fellow humans and towards God." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 44)

"The paradox of my relation with the world it consists, on one hand, of my need for the world, and on the other hand, it consists of the need of restraining my greediness for too many things from the world, by giving those things as gifts to others. Or, it consists of using the world in both senses. The more I use the world for another, by detaching myself from the world, the more I use the world for myself. For I need, from bodily perspective, too little, though it is good to me to tend to know the world, to spiritually possess the world until my end, in the whole world's indefinite extent. Only by bodily detaching myself from the world, I transfigure the world, by introducing within the world, through knowledge and through giving, the love for others, and through this I see God." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 46)

"The human being is amazed about the power given to him, for reaching, with the help of God and with the collaboration of his fellow humans, to master the world and to transfigure the cosmos, and to be elevated on the level of god by grace, but he also realizes the very narrow limits of his power, or his helplessness, when he reckons that, the power he has, it is from himself. This is for this power comes from renouncing to himself. The man was given the choice of using the power he has been given with, and that brings the illusion that he has his power from himself. The nature dominated by the human being, with the illusion that the human being can make anything he wants with the nature, it shows its limitation through pollution, through destruction caused by the human science and technique, through using the nature's energies in mode exceeding a certain measure, and through the neuroses weakening the people, because of their estrangement from a peaceful live within nature.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 46)

“The man can advance in mastering the nature but he still must remain within the nature’s limits. The man can also use another way of mastering the nature, by elevating himself above nature, through the power given him through his spiritual growth, by the union with God, and through the man’s humbleness.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 46)

“Though in reciprocal dependence on the purpose of their valorization, between human being and world there is a value hierarchy. The human being holds the superior position in comparison to the world, through his conscience that discovers the values of the world, and through his freedom in organizing the world in diverse modes, sometimes alternatively. The world has the human being as its purpose, not through itself, but through a Subject placing the human being above the world, as subject using the world.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 62)

“If I consider the created world as non-absolute - and I must consider it like that, given its insufficiency and its meaningless, if I consider the world as absolute - I will implicitly admit a Creator Who can remove the world’s insufficiency and Who gives the world a meaning. In this Lord Jesus Christ confirms me as hypostasis. Jesus Christ unites within Himself the Creator with the creation.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 70)

“The Christendom admits both the God’s perfection and the universe’s insufficiency through itself its quality as created, but capable of rejoicing the consummation into God, if it wants to. This doctrine saves, by this, both the dignity of the freedom in the whole divine and human existence, and the real existence of the good and the fact that the good differs from evil.” (Stăniloae 1995: 22)

“The created universe hasn’t come to existence and hasn’t been lasting into existence without being somehow imparted with God. The universe hasn’t been created out of something; but neither the universe has been created out of God’s being, and neither out of something else. But that means that the universe owes its existence exclusively to God’s power, a power manifested in God’s work. Without God’s work it couldn’t have been possible to come to existence a universe differing from God. The universe exists and it lasts due to God’s power, but the universe isn’t itself the power of God. The exclusive power of God has created and it upholds the universe, as something differing from His being and from His power. The God’s power differs from any power’s power, by being able to create something out of nothing, and by being able to uphold that something in existence. Everything real within universe, it is the exclusive product of the God’s voluntary power. The real exists, in this sense, out of the impartation with God. The God's almighty creator work is shown in the fact that it can bring something to existence out of nothing, or by not using anything. The limitless power of God has been shown in the fact that He has created something differing from Himself, and by not using any substance." (Stăniloae 1995: 24)

"The fact that the universe isn't a part of the God's being – and the universe's insufficiencies show us this –, it doesn't mean that the universe doesn't have a certain likeness to god, or that God doesn't have in his will for creating the universe, also a reason in the plenitude of His being. God has in the plenitude of His being, the capacity of creating the universe, and He creates the universe as an existence capable of being in a communication with Him, through the natural power which the universe was given with, by God, when the universe has been created. That's why, the Holy Fathers' teaching, though it affirms that the universe has been created out of nothing – and that the universe isn't a part of God's being –, it still reckons the universe as a masterpiece of God's almightiness and wisdom. So, though created out of nothing, the universe shows in itself the signs of the God's almightiness and wisdom, by reflecting them in itself or even because of reflecting them." (Stăniloae 1995: 28)

"The Holy Fathers affirmed that the universe had been created not only by God's kindness, in order the things to be resemblant to God in kindness, in their entirety, but the universe has been created also by God's wisdom, in order the universe to show that it has within a likeness to God's power." (Stăniloae 1995: 29)

"The universe, as shadow of the existence, it can be even lesser understood as standing in itself, the more it is called as shadow in the sense as image of the plenary existence; namely, in the shadow one can see the contour, partially inconsistent but still real, of the true and fully consistent existence of God. The shadow is, by that, a transparent environment and a proof of the godlike existence, a dependent and frail form of that true existence. But the shadow would have been vain, if it had been destined to always remain as a non-fully consistent shadow, or as unsatisfied with this non-fully real existence. If it had existed as such, eternally, it would have meant that God Himself projects it, necessarily, as an unsatisfactory completion to His narrowness. That's why the universe is, on one hand, a shadow of the Word, and on the other hand, the Word is in the universe in an increasingly inside manner, in an increasingly consistent manner, so that He is helping the universe to advance, if the universe wants it, within Him. And for that too, the universe has been given the time, as gift, in order to advance in this reality whose projection the universe is, and this advancing will come to an end when the universe will be filled up with the whole consistency of the Word. So, the time has a positive function, related to the dynamic character of the universe, as shadow of God, in order the universe to advance towards the target of the full union with the universe's Prototype. The time has a positive function for the universe, but not an eternal function. If the creation hadn't lived any presence of the Word, as above universe and plenary existence, and Who attracts the universe towards Him, then the universe would have been, actually, "shadow and dream". And how could have existed, actually? In this state of accentuated separation from the Word, from the rationality maintained within universe by the godlike Rationality, it ends to be mastered by death, due to a voluntarily disorganized life and in the disharmony of all its parts." (Stăniloae 1995: 30)

"The Catholic theologian Herbert Mühlen drew, out of the creation's character as shadow, the conclusion that the creation, is by its nature itself, as profane. He identified the profane to the created and the sacred to the uncreated, namely to God's being. (...) We reckon that such a conception, it is influenced by the Catholic teaching about the sin as the pure nature of the human being and the human being's life into God as supra-natural. Instead, the Eastern Holy Fathers saw the "nature", in its quality as work of God, as "good"." (Stăniloae 1995: 30-31)

"One can see the Creation's whole in each component part, but all those wholes, they are united in a universal whole. The whole of each part and the whole of all the universe's parts, it is so efficient and it is so decisive to the parts' specificity, and to upholding the universe, that it is admitted not only that it is composed by the component parts, but also that it gathers and it keeps the parts together, and in the fact that it imprints them its specificity. This whole shows its power also in the fact that the species' individuals can adapt themselves to diverse changing external circumstances, receiving modifications, but not in order to be brought out of their species. (...) The whole universe is a whole composed by non-confounded and unchanging wholes, but which can be modified within certain limits." (Stăniloae 1995: 47-48)

"The universe is a universe of meanings, for it bears within the seal of the Word of God and the Ghost from the Word urging the human being to give thanks for his/her own existence and for the universe's existence, for, by seeing that he/she doesn't have those from himself/herself, he/she cogitates those as given, as gift, by the Father through the son. The human being and the universe cannot be except existences-of-meanings, for they are the image of the original existence-of-meanings, received by the Word from the Father. The human being must recognize on himself, and the universe, as gift from the Father Who is the supreme Origin, for the human being and the universe are the image of the divine being received by the Son, as gift. If there hadn't been a Father Who gave His being to the Son, the universe wouldn't have been an image of this gift. If at the origin of all things, there hadn't been a Father Who gives His being as gift, to the Son, neither could have been the human being's and the universe's existence as a gift of love, but they would have been an emanation imposed by a law and it would have been meaningless a relation between the human being and the Giver of that existence." (Stăniloae 1995: 51-52)

"Without the Word and especially without the Word embodied as man Who to lead the people, over time, towards the love the Word has it for the Father, the time would have been meaningless. The time bears the seal of the Word and the time will be assumed by the embodied Word, in order Him to lead the time towards eternity, or towards the time's end, without being lost the good things gained over time, and that means leading the people, over time, towards becoming eternal into Christ. The universe not only that was created through the Word from before eternity, but it was also created for the Word who followed to embody Himself, in order to gather the universe in an eternal union with Him and with the Holy Trinity." (Stăniloae 1995: 56)

"The human being has been created in order his life to become the life of God-the Word, and the human being's life that unites the spirit with the material matter, by becoming the human life of God-the Word, the material universe too, to become His, as environment of manifestation of the godlike Person." (Stăniloae 1995: 56)

"(...) the man and the cosmos can be themselves reckoned as a natural Revelation." (Stăniloae 2003: 10)

"Therefore, the world as object it is only the means of a dialogue of thoughts and loving deeds between the rational supreme Person and the rational human persons, as also between the human persons." (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

"Far from hindering the development of the creation (seeing the meaning of the existence as communion with God and deification of the man, and seeing the universe as means of dialogue between God and men, o. n.), this faith ensures this developing towards infinite and in eternity, like the man aspires." (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

"This faith (Orthodox Christendom, E. l. t.'s n.), it expresses the incontestable fact that the world is made for a meaning, and therefore is the product of a Creator Who is a meanings giver, and that the world is led towards the meaning's fulfilling in Himself, and in order this purpose to be fulfilled the Creator Himself leads our being towards the closest possible union with Him." (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

“The need for world which the people have, and their capacity of disposing of world, it represents a temptation to the people, to become attached to the world, and to trust their creator powers. In the quality of embodied spirits, it also stays the greatness, but also the danger of the people’s falling. In dominating the effect, there it can be actualized a new force of the spirits. But these effects can also to close up the infinite horizons the human spirit is called towards. The difficulties the life into body is tied to, they can develop within man an own responsibility and the noble impulse of helping his fellow human with the deed, a responsibility and capacity the angels lack it, but they also can develop the egotism and the exaggerated worldly worry.” (Stăniloae 2003: 463)

“The Western man has reduced his report with the nature exclusively to a consumption report. In order to do that, he must transform himself in a piece of nature, understood as process of external transformation of the substances. Instead of elevating the nature from this state of decaying in sin – because it is decaying its desertion of any other content and its transformation in a monotonous mill of transforming the matter in an appetizing object, causing bodily lusts, sin, therefore – the Western man has made himself one with the nature. He tends towards merging with the nature in order to be, finally, satisfied.” (Stăniloae 2005: 66)

“The Eastern conceptions sees the nature not only as a bosom full with consumption goods, neither it sees the man’s purpose as a machine from grinding them down. The nature has also the purpose of being transfigured in window towards the supra-natural mysteries. It has a revelational purpose too, a purpose as ladder towards God; the man doesn’t discover this purpose not only by simply polishing his intelligence, but rather by his ethical elevation. The nature has an aesthetical function too, the aesthetic being meant to be joined to the ethical and religious purposes. It imposes a certain embarrassment of the man, and urge to put on spiritual values, for either in this act the man not to become an animal.” (Stăniloae 2005: 67)

“In the Orthodox icon and in the art of the Romanian people, there are indications for a sacramental conception upon the seen world, which bridles the lusts and imposes shyness before nature, compelling to the endeavor of liberating the nature from under the degrading powers, urging us to the true activism and the authentic heroism of the man, to that one saving the man from under the decayed nature; and for the culture expresses the most ideals of a people, those ones which that people can preach while standing uprightly, let’s ask ourselves, it doesn’t the time from today compelling us to create a culture which to develop, finally, the indications of the Romanian spirituality, as the only ones saving for the mankind?" (Stăniloae 2005: 67)

Worry

“According to Heidegger, the worry is a structure comprising the entire man’s constitution. Through worry, the man is always “beyond himself” (Sichvorwegsein). The worry is a restless structure of the man’s dynamism, an existential structure, and it isn’t a static feature. In this man’s general characteristic of “being always before himself” it is manifested the phenomenon of the “fear” (Angst), another existential; structure of the man, which is fueled on one hand by the fact that the man is an existence taking part to the world, unsure of the possibilities which the world can provide us with, and on the other hand, by the sentiment that he is a being given to his own responsibility, having always to launch himself towards his future possibilities, namely towards the most characteristic possibility of his.” (Stăniloae 1992: 88-89)

“The worry’s engine is the fear and the man tries through worry to always accomplish his future possibilities related to the world that he is nailed in. Being part of the world, it essentially means being worried. The worry do not let the man free from its chains, not even for a moment, while the man lives: “Cura teneat, quamdiu vixerit” says a legend from mythology, which divides the man between Jupiter (the soul), Tellus (the earth), and the worry (the existence of earth).” (Stăniloae 1992: 89)

“Heidegger confessed that this interpretation of the man as worry, as also this phenomenological analysis of the worry, it came to him out of a trying of his for interpreting the Augustinian anthropology, namely the Hellenic-Christian anthropology.” (Stăniloae 1992: 89)

“The features of the worry are: 1) it is a fruit of the fear; 2) a fruit of the man’s intertwining with the world (of fearing the world); 3) and as permanent launching before himself; 4) because of the awareness that he is given to himself; 5) in order to accomplish his most characteristic possibility; but through worry 6) the man doesn’t search for and he doesn’t actually obtain the accomplishing of his most characteristic possibility, because of not springing out to himself as his intimate self, and therefore the purpose characteristic to the existence it has remained yet, hidden to him – this corresponding to the Christian anthropological conception.” (Stăniloae 1992: 89)

“The analysis that Heidegger done it to the worry, it isn’t a complete one, firstly because of the fact that the worry he focused upon it has some more characteristics, and secondly because of the Christendom knows another worry too, besides this worldly worry. The analysis of the worldly worry it misses three more elements: the addiction, the pleasure, and the pain; they are the essential spikes nailing the man to the world, and which the man feels the “In-der-Welt-sein” through, and which explain the man’s “fear” of the world. The addiction searches for the pleasure that ties the man to the world. The addiction, intertwined with the pain, they determine the man to permanently launch himself before himself, in order to secure for himself the pleasure and to avoid the pain. And the worldly fear is a precisely determined fear: the fear of not lacking the pleasure in the future and of experiencing pain. Besides, this determines the man that, instead of unveiling "his intimate self" (das Selbst) and instead of searching for accomplishing his characteristic possibility, to remain through worry as fallen to the state of the general self (das Man) and to accomplish possibilities which are improper to him, or to fail – failure that isn't explained by Heidegger, for he overlooked the elements which could have explained it." (Stăniloae 1992: 89-90)

"The aspect well highlighted by Heidegger as effect of the worry it is the total or exaggerated enchainment of the man to the world, and his going down to a grey, improper, monotonous, enslaved, and superficial existence." (Stăniloae 1992: 90)

"By the fact that Heidegger sees as last explanation of the worry in the man's sentiment that he must accomplish "his most characteristic – possibility", a target missed by the worry as analyzed by Heidegger, as also by the fact that even the man who has retrieved his intimacy he still launches himself before himself in order actually to accomplish his most characteristic possibility, we can see that to Heidegger it shined such a worry for an instant, to which he still shied to name it as worry too. This is the man's "worry" for his eternal fate, the worry for salvation." (Stăniloae 1992: 90)

"The worry for salvation it opposes to the worldly worry. It is no longer the man's worry for his existence within world, and it no longer comes out of the addiction to the world's pleasures, and therefore neither is the fear of the world's pains. A contrary, this worry springs out where it is rejected "the whole worldly worry", for this worry it means the worry to be pleasant to God, and not to be pleasant to the world in order to become partakers to the world's pleasures and to be spared of the world's pains. This worry of being pleasant to God it grows up out of the responsibility that the man has for his true self, by satisfying the commandments of this responsibility; this worry is in the same time a continuous launching of the man over himself, towards the source of his eternal life, but it is a launching towards the height from beyond the world, and not downwards, towards the world, but it is a true self-surpassing. This worry it interprets at its turn a man's fear, but it is a fear of definitively ending in death, this fear being the only one able to escape the man from what he fears in the world. To the definition of this worry it doesn't belong anymore to the addiction to the world, as the absolute and the man's total appurtenance to the world (In-der-Welt-sein). The man continues be to within the world, but he is in the same time above the world; on one hand, the man is in a necessary mode within world by the bodily side of his being; but on the other hand, the man is and he tends to be above world, or he is even within world as free and spiritual being, and therefore he is, in the world, unlike what the animals and the things are like. The world can take hold on the man, but not on the whole of the man's being. On one hand, the world takes hold upon the man; on the other hand, on an even greater measure, the world is at the man's disposition." (Stăniloae 1992: 90-91)

"The man must get rid of the worldly worry, in order to make on himself available to God. When the man has got rid of the worldly worry, he escaped the addiction, he has achieved the dispassion, and he has become free of passions and of world. The purification aims this liberation from worry, and not the liberation from worrying about God. Through the worry about God, or by fulfilling the will of God, it is being accomplished our authentic human being." (Stăniloae 1992: 91)

"Heidegger said that the man is always launched beyond himself by his worry. The man isn't fenced in the present instant, but on each instant the man goes beyond himself, he is ahead of himself through his worry, and so he has his horizon open. But Heidegger didn't tell that there is worry and worry. So, there is an egotistic worry, which the man preoccupies himself through, with the things needed by his selfishness. This is a worry rolling us further in egotism. This is the worry that doesn't really leads us further, but it moves us around in the closed circle of our interests. This is the worldly worry, the egotistic worry, which the Christendom reckons it as a sin, because of engaging the whole our attention and we are no longer able to think at the true infinite of the transcendent.

But there is also a worry of getting rid of egotism, and not a worry for maintaining ourselves in this closed by death life, but of keeping us on the plan of the eternity. There is a worry in the favor of egotism, and there is another worry for melting down the egotism within ourselves. This last worry looks not only forwards, but also backwards. But it doesn't look backwards in order to forget about present or future, in order to get petrified as Lot's wife did, but in order to contribute to the melting down of the egotism residues placed in the past on our way, so that we to be able in the future to work better, in order to be actually able to advance. The face of this worry, turned backwards, in order to remove the impediments, the egotism gathered as impediments on the way of the future, it is the repentance. Better said, the repentance looks also backwards, regretting the egotistic manifestations and habits, but the repentance looks also ahead, with the decision of no longer serving those. Through repentance we embrace in the same time the past, the present, and the future, by making out of the looking towards the past a force for the future. But the future is being revealed to us as advancing even further towards the luminous realm of the love's kingdom, and therefore towards ever more love for God and for our fellow humans. The worry for myself, that Heidegger was preoccupied with, it is being transformed in care for loving God and the people. And as the repentance embraces not only the past, the present, and the future, but it embraces also our fellow humans, with the embracing of an ever fuller love. The love's repentance is advancing slowly, but strenuously, on the love's realms, according to the full of poetry image created by Saint Isaac the Syrian. And if it is so, the repentance isn't a matter of particular life, but it is a matter of the highest interest to the general destiny of the community. The repentance can largely contribute making the world more twinned, by consuming the egotism and by increasing the love's dough. The repentance can contribute in a great measure to accomplishing a real, theandric solidarity, inwardly and durably, amongst all the individuals of the human collectivity." (Stăniloae 1992: 112-113)

"The people take care of buying, while they still are in the market, also the things which to make them happy after the market closes. Heidegger highlighted how much the people are drowned in the worry for the things from the material universe, and how much the people lose their authentic existence because of that worry. But Heidegger didn't see as opposed to that worry except a fear of something mysterious. But that cannot liberate the man from his egotistic worries for himself, neither it can institute relations of brotherhood and of reciprocal and superior responsibility, causing of joy, amongst people. The human being can liberate himself, to a certain extent, from the burden of the opaque worries and he can get out from the feeling of "being thrown within the material universe", only by having the desire to live, on himself, with the hope that he doesn't exist "towards definitive death", and by believing that he lives towards resurrection for eternity." (Stăniloae 1995: 97)

"The alternative to fulfilling the human being's responsibility for himself and for others, it is that of taking the selfish and fearful worry for the passing life in the material universe, which the human being surely loses, but in this case the human being will receive nothing in exchange, if the care for his body darkens him inasmuch that he loses from his sight the eternity that he has been created for. Such a human being believes that he saves himself by taking care of his body, and not through his unlimited faith in God. Neither in such a case the human being can live without a responsibility; but he has chosen a false responsibility for his body, a comfortable, a pleasant, and a liar responsibility, that disrobes him of any strength and that separated him from other people, and makes him enemy with them. That false responsibility is followed by eternal death. That responsibility is no longer a responsibility in front of the supreme forum, the only one whom the human being is responsible to, and who can provide the human being, in exchange, with the eternal life. Being really responsible it means being responsible in front of the supreme forum that can make the human being strong, or real. It is an all the greater responsibility as the human being knows what price he is going to pay for it: his eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 98)

“Related to the worry it is also the fear for an unhappy future. So, through this too, the human being is open to the future. This too, it helps the human being to prepare for himself a happy future.” (Stăniloae 1995: 133)

Worshipping

“We owe Christ a sole worshipping: as God, for the worshipping is addressed to the Person - and Christ’s Person is one: the embodied Son of God. The worshipping is a part of a dialogue, and there is no dialogue except between persons. There cannot be dialogue between natures, be it s even the nature of a person, and even the nature of the Person of Jesus Christ. The Person in Christ is the embodied Son of God. He was worshipped as the Son of God by Apostle Thomas too: “My Lord and my God” (Jn. 20: 28). Jesus Christ showed Himself, on Himself, even in His humbleness, like “God, loving of people by nature, making, on Himself, by His birth out of woman, willingly, accessible to us. That’s why we bring to Him, as embodied too, a sole worshipping, together to the Father and to the Ghost too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 44)

“If we had given Christ two worshipping, we would have split Him in two persons. But how would we do that? If we wanted to split Him in two persons, because of not being us able to find a demarcation line between them, we would see through the mediation of the human person the godlike One, and this would mean that Christ hasn’t elevated us to the direct relation with God, but we have remained at the indirect relation with God through a man, as through the prophets from the Old Testament. Properly-said, in such a case, as person amongst the human persons, we would have own to Christ only the honoring due to a holy man, the worshipping granted to the Son of God it would no longer be directed towards the concrete person of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 44)

“Leontius of Byzantium brought another reason too, for a sole worshipping given to Christ as to God. The One Christ is worshipped whole as God, by the fact that the One Hypostasis from Him being godlike, in Him it is hypostatized - and therefore deified - the human nature. If one had worshipped only a half of Christ as God, he would have cut the One Hypostasis, which is whole and God - and not only whole as man - in two, or one would have denied the whole His extension within the deified human nature. So, it would have been recognized only a halt of God. But this half it wouldn’t have been a true God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 44)

“The direct presence of Christ is too overwhelming in order not to be lived all the time. And this living of His presence by the believers, it takes the form of the worshipping. If we considered Him in a parallel manner, or if we considered Him in some moments as man, it would mean no to be lived all the time His overwhelming presence as God, but to be detached from Him the person of a simple man, who to be entirely regarded as a simple man, being Him given the consideration due to any man. But Christ isn’t, on half, a simple man, and by no means, it could be seen a half of Him as a simple man.

Though, by worshipping Him as God, we do not make abstraction of the fact that he is a man too. (Stăniloae 2006: 44)

“To this unique Subject (to Christ, t. n.) it couldn’t correspond, either from our part, a more or less concomitant joining of two kinds of worshipping, but a sole kind of worshipping which, by being keenly aware of the fact that Christ is wholly God, and this worshipping feels in the same time that God is neigh, as One Who has made, on Himself, man and accessible to the people. The worshipping brought to Christ as God, it doesn’t live Him as a far away and unimaginable God, but it lives Him like a God Who has come close to us and Who remains so forever and ever. This God understands us, He has made, on Himself, familiar to us, we can have towards Him a daring founded on the love he has shown by the fact that he has made, on Himself, man, and he has entered the relation with us as a man amongst us. But this daring doesn’t go so far than to reckon Him as a simple man, for if that had been the case, we wouldn’t have had in Him the proof of the extraordinary love of God for us, neither our love would have had that warmth we do not want to put any limit to. When addressing to Jesus, we tell Him: “Most-sweet Jesus, the beloved warmth, warm me up!”, but we do not forget to tell Him also: “Jesus, almighty, Jesus, most-glorified!” or, we tell Him: “Most-sweet Jesus” just because we know that the almighty Jesus has descended to us out of His love and he is able to be as sweet as no man can.” (Stăniloae 2006: 45)

“The Church exalts Jesus Christ in its doxologies, together with the Father and with the Ghost, ever since the apostolic period. Since then, the Church has been granting Him the appellative of: Lord - corresponding to Yahweh from the Old Testament (II Cor. 10: 13; Gal. 2: 5; II Pet. 3: 18 etc.). In the worshipping brought to Christ as to God, it is implied His equality and His unity with the Father and with the Holy Ghost. That’s why in all the Church’s doxologies He is exalted together with the Father and with the Holy Ghost. In the hymn from after the second litany from the Liturgy, we call Christ: “Being One from the Holy Trinity, together worshipped with the Father and with the Holy Ghost”. (Stăniloae 2006: 45)

“In his work Worshipping in Ghost and Truth, Saint Cyril develops the idea that we cannot enter to the Father, except as clean sacrifice. But we cannot transpose us, by ourselves, in this state of clean sacrifice. That’s why Christ accepted the state of clean sacrifice, for, by entering to the Father in this state, to introduce us too, gathered in Himself, whilst He is dwelling, Himself, within us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 58)

The Biography¹ of Priest Professor PhD Academician Dumitru Stăniloae

The greatest Orthodox Romanian theologian of all times, the priest professor PhD academician Dumitru Stăniloae was born on 16th of November 1903 at Vlădeni, Braşov County, and he dies on 5th of October 1993.

He studied at “Andrei Şaguna” High School from Braşov (1914-1922) and he studied at the Faculty of Letters from Bucharest (one year) and then at the Faculty of Theology in Chernivtsi (1923-1927), where he obtained the PhD in 1927. He was sent by the Archbishop Nicolae Bălan to specialization studies of dogmatic and of history of the Church, at the Faculties of Theology from: Athens (1927-1928), Munich, and Berlin (1928 – 1929), doing also documentation travels at Paris and Belgrade. Returned from studies he was appointed substitute teacher (1929), provisional teacher (1932) and after that, definitive holder (1935) of the department of Dogmatics at the “Andreiana” Theological Academy from Sibiu², where he functioned until 1946 (he taught also Apologetics 1929 – 1932 and 1936 – 1937, Pastoral Theology in 1932 – 1936, and the Greek Language (1929 – 1934). After the election of the rector Nicolae Colan like bishop of Cluj³, Priest Professor Dumitru Stăniloae was appointed rector of the Academy (1936 – 1946). Ordained deacon in 1931, priest in 1932, stavrophore dean in 1940; he was member of the diocesan assembly of the Sibiu Archdiocese and archdiocesan adviser, editor of the “Romanian Telegraph” Newspaper (between: January 1934 – May 1945). He will be transferred through appointment at the Faculty of Theology from Bucharest, at the department of Ascetics and Mystics (January 1947 – 1948); in the year 1948 when the faculty has became Theological Institute of University degree, Dumitru Stăniloae was assigned titular professor of Dogmatic and Symbolic Theology, with an interruption in the period of 1957 – 1963 while he was in detention in the communist prisons; Professor Dumitru Stăniloae comes back to the University in the period of 1965-1973; after his retirement he activated like consultant professor for doctoral studies.

Over six decades Priest Professor PhD Academician Dumitru Stăniloae undertook a multilateral scientific activity, especially in the domain of the Dogmatics, being considered one of the most important Christian theologian and thinker of the world. He published books, studies, and translations. He was appointed in diverse delegations of the Romanian Orthodox Church which visited other Churches: Germany (1970), Greece (1971), Coptic Church from Egypt (1971), Vatican (1971); he was delegated to the second Congress of the Professors of Orthodox Theology from Athena (1976); he participated to numerous consultations and theological conferences, organized by diverse Commissions of the Ecumenical Council of the Churches, in many countries; he

¹ This biography it is taken in its entirety from “Romanian Theologians Dictionary”, from:

<http://biserica.org/Who`sWho/DTR/S/DumitruStăniloae.html>

² A City which is the capital of the county with the same name: Sibiu, which is situated in the middle of Romania, and is a ancient academic centre, laic and theological.

³ A Romanian county situated in the Middle - West of Romania.

held conferences like invitee, at the faculties of theology from: Athens, Thessalonica, Paris, Strasbourg, Bonn, Heidelberg, Tübingen, Freiburg, Geneva, Oxford, at the Ecumenical Institute from Bossey in the U.S.A. and so on; Dumitru Stăniloae was part of the Romanian Orthodox Commission for the theological dialogue with the Evangelical Church from Germany, participating to numerous meetings in both countries. His rich theological activity put in the service of the Christian Church and its unity, it was appreciated by being granted many distinctions: “doctor honoris causa” of the faculty of Theology from Thessalonica (1976), of the “Saint Serge” Institute from Paris (1981), of the Faculty of Theology from Belgrade (1982), and of the University from Bucharest in (1992); the prize “Dr. Leopold Lucas” of the Evangelic University of Tübingen; the “Saint Augustine of Canterbury Cross” granted by the Primacy of England (1981) and so on.

Priest professor PhD Dumitru Stăniloae was correspondent member (1990), and then full member of the Romanian Academy (1992).

Index of Works of Priest Professor PhD Academician Dumitru Stăniloae

Books:

The Life and the Activity of The Patriarch Dosoftei of Jerusalem and His Connections with the Romanian Countries, Cernivtsi, 1929, 169 pages, (doctoral thesis);

The Catholicism from After the War, Sibiu, 1933, 204 pages;

Orthodoxy and Romanianism, Sibiu, 1939, 395 pages;

The Position of Mister Lucian Blaga towards the Christianity and Orthodoxy, Sibiu, 1942, 150 pages;

The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory of Palamas. With Three Translated Treaties, Sibiu, 1938, 250 + CXL pages;

Jesus Christ or the Man's Restoration, Sibiu, 1943, 404 pages (also in the Annual number XIX of the Theological Academy “Andreiane” 1942 – 1943, p. 5 – 406);

The Dogmatic and Symbolic Theology. Manual for the Theological Institutes, 2 volumes, Bucharest, 1958, 1008 pages (in collaboration with the professors Nicolae Chitescu, Isidor Todoran and Ioan Petreuta);

The Dogmatic Theology for the Theological Institutes, 3 volumes, Bucharest, 1978, 504 + 380 + 463 pages (considered “and ample synthesis of the Dogmatic Theology of the Orthodox Church, with ecumenical openings, a pinnacle of the Romanian Dogmatic thinking, and a sure point of departure for new developments in the dogmatic thinking”);

The Moral Orthodox Theology for the Theological Institutes, volume III, The Orthodox Spirituality, Bucharest, 1981, 320 pages;

Spirituality and Communion into the Orthodox Liturgy, Craiova, 1986, 440 pages;

The Immortal Form of God, Craiova, 1987, 392 pages;

Studies of Dogmatic Orthodox Theology, Craiova, 1990, 705 pages;

Reflections about the Spirituality of the Romanian Orthodox People, Craiova, 1992, 162 pages;

Seven Mornings with the Father Stăniloae (Dialogues with Sorin Dumitrescu), Bucharest, 1992, 272 pages;

The Holy Trinity or At the Beginning Was the Love, Bucharest, 1993, 96 pages;

Commentary at the Gospel of John, Craiova, 1993;

Jesus Christ or the Light of The Word, Bucharest, 1993;

The Living God into the Orthodoxy, Anthology, introductory study and notes by Radu Frunza, Cluj – Napoca, 1993, 240 pages.

Second editions:

The Christian Ascetical and Mystical of the Theology of the Spiritual Life, Bucharest, 1991, 320 pages (Cluj - Napoca, 1993, 537 pages and an edition at Alba Iulia, 2 volumes, 197 + 207 pages); (it is his course of Ascetic and Mystic, initially appeared like the volume III from the Manual of Orthodox Moral Theology):

The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas, Bucharest, 1993;

The Position of Mister Lucian Blaga Towards the Christianity and Orthodoxy, Bucharest, 1993;

Orthodoxy and Romanian-ism, Bucharest, 1993;

Jesus Christ or The Man`s Restoration, Craiova, 1993, 430 pages;

The Orthodox Dogmatic Theology, 3 volumes, Bucharest, 1994.

Translations:

Hristos Andrutso, The Dogmatic of the Oriental Orthodox Church, Sibiu, 1930, XVI + 48 pages;

Wilhelm Nyssen, Earth Singing in Images. The External Frescoes of the Monasteries from Moldavia, Bucharest, 1978, 196 pages + illustrations;

Philokalia or Chrestomathy from the Writings of the Holy Fathers which Shows How the Man Can Purify Himself – The Light and the Consummation. Translation, Introduction And Notes, I, Sibiu, 1946, XIII + 404 pages; II, Sibiu, 1947, XX + 285 pages; III, Sibiu, 1948, XVI + 464 pages; IV, Sibiu, 1948, VII + 327 pages; V, Bucharest, 1976, 329 pages; VI, Bucharest, 1976, 392 pages; VII, Bucharest, 1977, 527 pages; VIII, Bucharest, 1979, 646 pages; IX, Bucharest, 1980, 645 pages; X, Bucharest, 1981, 523 pages; XI, Publishing House of the Archidiocèse of Roman, 1990, 698 pages; XII, Bucharest, 1991, 296 pages;

Second editions:

The volume I-IV from Philokalia, Bucharest, 1992.

In the Collection Entitled: Fathers and Churchly Writers:

Saint Gregory of Nyssa, Writings, First Part, Bucharest, 1982, 496 pages (in collaboration with priest professor Ioan Buga);

Saint Maximos the Confessor, Writings, First Part, Bucharest, 1983, 372 pages and the Second Part, Bucharest, 1990, 367 pages;

Saint Athanasius the Great, Writings, First Part, Bucharest, 1987, 416 pages, and the Second Part, Bucharest, 1988, 256 pages;

Saint Cyril of Alexandria, Writings, First Part, Bucharest, 1991, 616 pages, the Second Part, Bucharest, 1992, 464 pages and the Third Part, Bucharest, 1994, 310 pages;

Saint John Climacus, the Ladder, Bucharest, 1992, 464 pages;

The Lausiatic History – Lavsaicon. Short Biographies of Ascetics, Bucharest, 1993, 128 pages;

Saint Dionysius the Aeropagite, Writings;

Saint Gregory from Nazianz, the Five Theological Words;

Different other translations in the “Theological Magazine” and in the “Metropolitan of Oltenia” magazine.

Dogmatics Studies in Churchly Magazines:

The Path Towards the Godlike Light at the Saint Gregory Palamas, in the fourth annual of the Theological Academy “Andreiana” from Sibiu, 1930, p. 55-72;

Two Treaties of Saint Gregory Palamos, in the ninth annual of the Theological Academy “Andreiana” from Sibiu, 1933, p. 5-70;

The Orthodox Anthropology, in the sixteenth annual of the Theological Academy “Andreiana” from Sibiu, 1940, p. 5-21;

The Cosmos and the Soul, Forms of the Church, in RT, year XXXIV, 1944, no. 3-4, p. 168-181, and no. 7-8, 1944, p. 335-336;

Elements of Orthodox Anthropology, in the Homage Volume Dedicated to the Romanian Patriarch Nicodim, Bucharest, 1946, p. 236-243;

The Patriarch Sergei of Moscow Like Theologian, in “The Orthodoxy”, year I, 1949, no. 2-3, p. 173-186; The Teaching About the Mother of God at the Orthodox and at the Catholics, in “The Orthodoxy”, year II, 1950, no. 4, p. 559-609;

The Mother of God Like Mediator, in “The Orthodoxy”, year IV, 1952, no. 3-4, p. 79-129;

The Forms and the Causes of the False Mysticism, in ST, year V, 1953, no. 1-2, p. 24-37;

The Godlike Eucharist in the Three Confessions, “The Orthodoxy”, year V, no. 1, p. 46-115;

The State of the Soul After the Particular Judgment in Orthodox and Catholic Teaching, “The Orthodoxy”, year V, 1953, no. 4, p. 545-614;

The Motives and the Dogmatic Consequences of the Schism, "The Orthodoxy", year VI, 1954, no. 2-3, p. 218-259;

The Good Deeds in the Orthodox and Catholic Teaching, "The Orthodoxy", year VI, 1954, nr. 4, p. 507-533;

The Confession of the Sins and the Repentance in the Past of the Church, in BOR, year LXXXIII, 1955, no. 3-4, p. 218-250;

Ecclesiological Synthesis, in ST, year VII, 1955, no. 5-6, p. 267-284;

The Individual Judgment after Death, in "The Orthodoxy", year VII, 1955, no. 4, p. 532-559;

The Being of The Mysteries into the Three Confessions, in "The Orthodoxy", year VIII, 1956, no. 1, p. 3-28;

The Number of the Mysteries, the Reports Between Them and the Problem of the Mysteries from Outside the Church, in "The Orthodoxy", year VIII, 1956, no. 2, p. 191-215;

The Primordial State of the Man in the Three Confessions, in "The Orthodoxy", year VIII, 1956, no. 3, 323-357;

The Internal Connection Between the Death and the Resurrection of God, in ST, year VIII, 1956, no. 5-6, p. 275-278;

The Orthodox and the Catholic Doctrine about the Ancestral Sin, in "The Orthodoxy", year IX, 1957, no.1, p. 3-40;

The Protestant Doctrine About the Hereditary Sin, Judged from the Orthodox Point of View, in "The Orthodoxy", year IX, 1957, no.2, p. 195-215;

The Symbol Like Anticipation and Basis of The Icon, in ST, year IX, 1957, no. 7-8, p. 427-452;

The Knowledge of God at the Saint John Chrysostom, in "The Orthodoxy", year IX, 1957, no. 4, p. 555-567;

Around the "Spiritual Homilies" of the Saint Makarios the Egyptian, in MO, year X, 1958, no. 1- 2, p. 15-38;

Jesus Christ Like Prototype of His Icon, in MMS, year XXXIV, 1958, no. 3-4, p. 244-271;

Community in Love, in "The Orthodoxy", year XV, 1963, no.1 p. 52-70;

"The Economy" in the Orthodox Church, in "The Orthodoxy", year XV, 1963, no. 2, p. 152-186;

The Ecumenical Movement and the Problems of the Contemporary World, in GB, year XXII, 1963, no. 3- 4, p. 305-326;

The Ecumenical Movement and the Christian Unity in the Actual State, "The Orthodoxy", year XV, 1963, no. 3-4, p. 544-589;

The Holy Tradition. The Defining of Its Notion and of Its Span, year XVI, 1964, in "The Orthodoxy", no. 1, p. 47-109;

The Authority of the Church, in ST, year XVI, no. 3- 4, p. 183-215;

The Notion of the Dogma, in ST, year VI, 1964, no. 9-10, p. 533-571;

The Trinitarian Relations and the Life of the Church, in "The Orthodoxy", year XVI, 1964, no. 4, p. 503-525;

The Connections Between Eucharist and the Christian Love, in ST, year XVII, 1965, no. 1-2, p. 3-32;

The Possibility of Dogmatic Reconciliation Between the Orthodox Church and the Old Oriental Churches, in "The Orthodoxy", year XVII, 1965, no.1, p. 5-27;

The Catholic Doctrine of the Infallibility at the First and at the Second Council from Vatican, in "The Orthodoxy", year XVII, 1965, no. 4, p. 459- 492;

The Universal and Synodal Church, in "The Orthodoxy", year XVIII, 1966, no. 2, p. 167-198;

From the Sacramental Aspect of the Church, in ST, year XVIII, 1966, no. 9-10, p. 530-562;

The Holy Ghost and the Earthly Church, "The Orthodoxy", year XIX, 1967, no.1, p. 32-48;

The Criteria of the Presence of the Holy Ghost, in ST, year XIX, 1967, no. 3-4, p. 103-127;

The Coordinates of the Ecumenism from the Orthodox Point of View, "The Orthodoxy", year XIX, 1967, no. 4, p. 494-540;

The Revelation Through Acts, Facts and Images, in "The Orthodoxy", year XX, 1968, no. 3, p. 347-377;

The Godlike Economy Like Basis of the Churchly Economy, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXI, 1969, no.1, p. 3-24;

The Revelation Like Gift and Promise, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXI, 1969, no. 2, p. 179-196;

The Eucharistic Theology, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXI, 1969, no. 3, p. 343-363;

The Theological Bases of the Hierarchy and Conciliarity, in ST, year XXII, 1970, no. 3-4, p. 165- 178;

The Holy Trinity, the Structure of the Supreme Love, in ST, year XXII, 1970, no. 5-6, p. 333-335;

Unity and Diversity in the Orthodox Tradition, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXII, 1970, no. 3, p. 333- 346;

The Transparency of the Church in the Sacramental Life, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXII, 1970, no. 4, p. 501-516;

God Is Love, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXIII, 1971, no. 3, p. 366-402;

Into the Problem of the Intercommunion, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXIII, 1971, no. 4, 561-594;

The Orthodox Teaching about Salvation and the Conclusions Which Result from It for the Christian Service into the World, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXIV, 1972, no. 2, p. 195-212;

The Form of Jesus into the Oriental Church: Jesus Christ the Supreme Gift and Word of God, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXV, 1972, no. 1, p. 5-17;

The Permanent and Noble Character of the Tradition, in ST, year XXV, 1973, no. 3-4, p. 149- 164;

The Form of God and His Responsibility into World, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXV, 1973, no. 3, p. 347- 362;

God Is the Light, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXVI, 1974, no. 1, p. 70-96;

The Holy Ghost in Revelation and in Church, in "The Orthodoxy", year XXVI, 1974, no.2, p. 216- 249;

Nature and Divine Grace in The Byzantine Theology, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXVI, 1974, no. 3, p. 392-439;

The Christology of the Synods, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXVI, 1974, no. 4, p. 573-579;

The Orthodox Conception About the Tradition and about the Development of the Doctrine, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXVII, 1975, no.1, p. 5-14;

The Creation Like a Gift and the Mysteries of the Church, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXVIII, 1976, no. 1, p. 10-29;

The Signification of the Godlike Light, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXVIII, 1976, no. 3-4, p. 433-436;

The Cross and the Christian Renewal in the Orthodox Teaching, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXIX, 1977, no. 7-8, p. 467-477;

The Dynamic of the Creation into Church, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXIX, 1977, no. 3-4, p. 281-291;

The Icons in The Orthodox Cult, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXX, 1978, no. 3, p. 475-487;

The Beings and the Hypostases from the Holy Trinity After Basil the Great, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXI, 1979, no. 1, p. 53-74;

Christology and Iconology in the Dispute From the VIII-IX Centuries, in ST, year XXXI, 1979, no. 1-4, p. 12-53;

Jesus Christ Hierarch Forever and Ever, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXI, 1979, no. 2, p. 217-231;

The Proceeding of the Holy Ghost from Father and His Relation with the Son Like Reason for Our Divinization and Adoption, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXI, 1979, no. 3-4, p. 583-592;

The Holiness in The Orthodoxy, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXII, 1980, no. 1, p. 33-43;

The Holy Scripture and The Apostolic Tradition in the Confession of The Church, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXII, 1980, no. 2, p. 204-220;

Our Consummation in Christ After the Teaching of the Orthodox Church, in MO, year XXXII, 1980, no. 1-2, p. 76-111, no. 3-6, p. 402-426, and the year XXXIII, 1981, no. 1-3, p. 96-104;

The Son of God, The Son of the Man, in MMS, year LVI, 1980, no. 9-12, p. 733-763;

The Liturgy, An Ascension Towards God and Gate of the Heaven, in MB, year XXXI, 1981, no. 1-3, p. 41-57;

The Proper Churchly Place, the Heaven on Earth of the Liturgical Center of the Creation, in MB, year XXXI, 1981, no. 4-6, p. 277-307;

The Ecumenical Synod and the Nicaea – Constantinople Symbol, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXIII, 1981, no. 3, p. 362-385;

The Idol Like a Face of the Divinized Nature and the Icon Like a Window towards the Godlike Transcendence, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXIV, 1982, no. 1, p. 12-27;

The Confession of the Right Belief Through the Prayers of the Priest and Through the Answer of the Believers, Like Preparation for the Accomplishing or the Eucharistic Sacrifice and the Impart with It, in MB, year XXXI, 1982, no. 1-3, p. 39-72;

The Church in Sense of Place and of Large Communion into Christ, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXIV, 1982, no. 3, p. 336-346;

The Ways of Presence of Christ in the Cult of the Church, in MB, year XXXII, 1982, no. 7-9, p. 429- 456;

The Sacrifice of Christ and Our Spiritualization Through the Impart of It, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXV, 1983, no.1, p. 104-118;

The Lutheran Doctrine about Justification and Word and a Few Orthodox Reflection, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXV, 1983, no. 4, p. 495-509;

The Contribution of the “Scythian Monks” to the Clarification of the Christology at the Beginning of the Sixth Century, in MO, year XXXVII, 1985, no. 34, p. 199-244;

The Holy Trinity – the Creator, the Savior and the Eternal Target for the Believers, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXXVI, 1986, no. 2, p. 14-42;

The Holy Trinity and the Creation of the World from Nothing, in Time, in MO, year XXXVIII, 1987, no. 2, p. 41-69 and no. 3, p. 28-47;

The Son and the Word of God Embodied and Resurrected Like Man, the Unifier of the Creation into Himself Forever and Ever, in MO, year XXXIX, 1987, no. 4, p. 7-23;

The Word, Creator and Eternal Savior, in MO, year XLIII, 1991, no.1, p. 7-19;

The Hierarchal Attraction of the World Towards the Holy Trinity Through the God`s Word Made a Man, in MO, year XLIII, 1991, no. 2, p. 14-34.

Works Published Overseas:

Three Works about Saint Maximos the Confessor, Athens, 1973 and 1978;

Prayer, Liberty, Holiness, Leimon Publishing House, Athens, 1980, 109 pages;

Dieu Est Amour. Traduction Commentée par Daniel Nesser, Geneva, Labor et Fides Publishing House, 1980, 122 pages;

Theology and The Church, translated by Robert Bessinger, foreword by John Meyendorff, Saint Vladimir Seminary Press, New York, 1980, 240 pages;

Pierre de Jesus et Experience du Saint Esprit, preface Olivier Clement, Paris, 1981, 136 pages;

Marc Antoine Costa de Beauregard, Dumitru Stăniloae, O Se Comprendre de L`Aime, Paris, Les Editions De Cerf, 1983, 221 pages;

Le Genie de L`Orthodoxies, traduite du roumain par Dan Ilie Ciobotea, Paris, 1985, 144 pages ;

Orthodoxe Dominik, Mit Einen Gleitwot Von Jurgen Moltmann Aus dem Rumanischen ubersetzt von Hermann Pitters (Okumenische Theologie), Zurich- Einsiedeln-Koln, 1985, 485 p.; vol. II, 1990, 305 p.; vol. III, 1993;

The Experience of God, translation by priest Ioan Ionita and Robert Barrinker, with the preface of the Archbishop Kalistos of Diocleia, Brookline – Massachusets, 1993, 280 pages (The first volume from the Dogmatic Theology);

God, The Unity and the Man, translation in Greek language by the priest Constantin Coman and Gheorghe Papaeftimi, Athens, 1990, 160 pages;

The Dogmatics, translated in Serbian language by the Archbishop Mitrofan Kodici, and printed in USA in 1994.

Works With Historical Character:

Consequences of the Tolerant Edict in Hațeg Counties, in the volume of “Brothers Alexander and John I. Lepădatu”, Bucharest, 1936, p. 837-842;

A Struggle for Orthodoxy in The Hațeg County, in the XV annual of the Theological Academy “Andreiana”, Sibiu, 1939, p. 5-76;

Consequences of the Tolerance Edict in the Făgăraș Counties, from the volume “Homage to Ioan Lupaș at the Sixty Anniversary”, Bucharest, 1943, p. 826- 833;

The Fight and the Drama of Inocențiu Micu Clein, in BOR, year LXXXVI, 1968, no. 9-10, p. 1137- 1185;

The Unionism from Transylvania, the Work of a Threefold Compelling Action, in BOR, year LXXXVII, 1969, no. 304, p. 355-390;

The Unionism from Transylvania a Trying to Tear Apart the Romanian People, Bucharest, 1973, 207 pages;

The Role of the Orthodoxy in the Forming and Keeping of the Being and of the National Unity of the Romanian People, in “The Orthodoxy”, year XXX, 1978, no. 4, p. 584-603;

The Oldness and the Spirituality of the Christian Romanian Terms in Solidarity with the Ones of the Romanian Language in General, in BOR, year XCVII, 1979, no. 3-4, p. 563-590;

Why We Are Orthodox (The Romanians), in MMB, year I (LXVII), 1991, p. 15-27;

Other hundreds of articles, notes, and many reviews in “The Romanian Telegraph”, and other churchly periodicals.